Francis Ford and Grace Cunard have shown that they are unsurpassed in their ability to produce and act plays of vivid dramatic qualities, dealing with crooks and detectives. That they are returning in a series of plays of this kind will be a keen source of pleasure to many. Again, there are some big surprises in store for you. If you remember, Francis Ford and Miss Cunard were in the east some time ago. One of the principal things which caused the trip was the opportunity to visit the various detective offices and study the newest methods in running down criminals; also to study the criminal records of several notorious people. When Mr. Ford and Miss Cunard returned to the Universal's West Coast studios they had an unlimited fund of fresh ideas and first-hand information which they will work into the new plays. The results? Well, you must see the first one in the series, "The Mysterious Hand," to appreciate them.

The play is in three reels and will be released Oct. 24.

TOM TERRISS IN "THE MYSTERY OF EDWIN DROOD."

Tom Terriss, who is the star of the screen version of Dickens' unfinished novel, "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," is one of England's most prominent stage figures. His father, William Terriss, was for many years the idol of the London populace where he appeared at the Adelphi Theater. His brother-in-law, Seymour Hicks, appears with his sister Ellaline Terriss before crowded houses wherever they go in England.

Mr. Terriss himself is a devotee of Dickens; to his works he has devoted his life, and it was under his direction that the first successful screen version of Dickens' play was ever made. That feature was "The Chimes," which was released through the World Film Corporation, who are also distributors of "The Mystery of Edwin Drood."

Mr. Terriss has been seen on the American stage in various Dickens plays, and has toured through Canada, Australia and Southern Africa, with his extensive repertoire from the masters' works.

In "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," Mr. Terriss appears as John Jasper, the evil-minded uncle who causes so much trouble by his wicked love for Rosa Bud. The company that has assembled to make this feature for the World Film Corporation, is an entirely English one, and included such famous players as Faye Cusick, Alfred Hemming and Paul Sterling.

"THE BOND OF WOMANHOOD" (Lubin).

In this Shannon Fife has told a very beautiful tale demonstrating the old axiom "That one touch of nature makes all men kin." The story tells of a high-born lady who is neglected by her husband, and a woman of the lowly who is similarily treated by a brute. The sorrows of the two suggest the bond of womanhood and each resolve to bring the other's husband to a sense of right and reason. The poor woman takes the initiative and the rich woman follows the example. In the end both men are made ashamed of their cruelty and seek pardon and reconciliation with their excellent wives, which end in happiness for all. The cast is an excellent one, including Col. Joe Smiley, Lilie Leslie, Justina Huff and many others. Many of the scenes were taken at the Lubin big estate, Betzwood, and are very beautiful.

MUTUAL'S LOUISVILLE BRANCH MOVES.

F. E. Hammer, manager of the Mutual Film Corporation, which recently opened offices in the Inter-Southern building, Louisville, has announced new quarters for the company. The new location will be in the Alamo Theater building of the Fourth Avenue Amusement Company. The film concern will move in as soon as the offices are completed, which will be about October 15. The location in the Inter-Southern building did not prove a good one, as it was out of the moving picture district.

WARNER'S INDIANAPOLIS MANAGER BUSY.

Announcement has been made that starting October 15 Warner's Features, Inc., will establish regular Warner service of three reels a day or twenty-one reels a week. S. B. Kramer, manager at Indianapolis, was in Louisville, Ky., last week and made arrangements for increasing the office force, taking on new quarters, and placing Ralph Studevyn, of the Indianapolis office, with the local office for the time being. Mr. Studevyn was formerly on the road in Kentucky for a Louisville film exchange, and will now travel out of the local Warner office over familiar territory.

GREAT NORTHERN'S LATEST.

The Great Northern Film Company announces that its regular release for the first part of October is now ready. It is a three-reel feature, entitled, "After Thirty Years," or "The Outcast's Return," which is a very unusual production and one of exceptional merit. When the representatives of the various trade papers reviewed this picture, under the title of "The Outcast's Return," they unanimously praised it, many of them being especially enthusiastic in their comments.

The picture is distinguished by a powerful and absorbing story, dealing with the hardships and sorrows of prison life, and by the remarkable acting of the player who interprets the leading role. He is A. Hertel, one of the greatest character actors of both the stage and screen.

Scene from "After Thirty Years" (Great Northern).

There are some of the most effective double exposures in this photoplay that have ever been seen in motion pictures. They are used to represent the unfortunate prisoner's dreams and are most artistic as well as realistic.

The feature will hold the interest of its audiences throughout its exhibition and will appeal to all classes of theatregoers. Some very interesting scenes within prison walls are afforded.

"THE QUARREL" (Eclair).

On Sunday, Oct. 18, the Eclair Film Company, Inc., will release a one-reel domestic drama entitled "The Quarrel." This picture was turned out at the producing studios of the Eclair Film Company, at Tucson, Arizona, and shows the versatility of the company in making photoplays other than "Westerns." The story is one which tells of a drunken brute and his awakening to the true disposition of his long patient wife, which brings forward Mildred Bright and Stanley Walpole in two strong, emotional roles. The picture is a one-reel masterpiece and will linger long in the minds of those who see it.

"THE THREE FATHERS" (World).

There is not a single exhibitor in Greater New York who does not know one of this trio. In their capacities as representatives of the New York Exchange of the World Film Corporation, they are in touch with every exhibitor within the confines of Greater New York. In addition to being proud of the fact that they are representatives, each one is proud to say he is a father.

J. Walter Lamb, who is at the right hand side of the picture, is the oldest father, since Dorothy Madeline Lamb, is six months old. She was the only baby at the last moving picture exposition, held at the Grand Central Palace. Walter's friends love to speak of him, as the "King of the Bronx."

On the left hand side of the picture there is the physiognomy of Jerome Sobel, whose fatherhood is of a comparatively recent date. The month of September, 1914, was the first month during which Mr. Sobel could be addressed officially as father. Mr. Sobel's friends are congratulating him on his being chosen manager of the Brooklyn subbranch of the corporation. Before settling down to the eventful life of representative for the New York Exchange, Mr. Sobel thought nothing of working twenty-four hours a day for the Miller 101 Ranch, Wild West Show, and the breezy manner that won him so many friends, when he was with "the big top" is winning as many friends for him in the feature game.

Maurice Lobel is standing in between the other two fathers already mentioned, and while Maurice is not seen by as many folks about the office as his confreres, he still is able to keep in touch with the doings of the office, by telephone. Nothing pleases Maurice better than being assigned to a string of night stands. Two months have elapsed since Maurice became a pater, and he still acts as though he were not concerned when babies are mentioned. One of the boys in the office said: "Who are the three gunmen?" when he saw this picture, while another one asked in what cabaret this trio worked. So, it is evident that there are many men of many minds in the New York Branch of the World Film Corporation, who love to see their friends' faces in print.

WARNING.

Every once in a while, sometimes in one part of the country and sometimes in another, we hear of a contemptible form of swindling by men who collect subscriptions for different publications. The Moving Picture World has been misrepresented in this way as well as nearly every other worth while publication. The latest we have heard of is a party who signs the name of Darling and who is offering in Ohio a year's subscription to this paper and a set of pictures for one dollar and fifty cents. All such offers are swindles pure and simple and we warn all our readers and the public against paying any money to anyone who claims to represent us.

The Moving Picture World does not appoint any special subscription agents and no one, newsdealer or news agent or any one whatsoever is authorized to receive yearly subscriptions for us except at the regular rates of three dollars in the States, three dollars and fifty cents in Canada or four dollars in foreign countries. Neither do we offer premiums of any sort.

"THE ROSE IN THE RING" (Lasky).

The accompanying photograph of Theodore Roberts as Thomas Braddock in the Lasky production of George Barr McCutcheon's novel of "The Rose in the Ring" was made shortly after Oscar Apfel and Theodore Roberts returned from a two weeks' stay, on tour, with the Barnum & Bailey circus, whither they journeyed to secure a local color and atmospheric detail for the production of this piece.

After attempting to prevail upon Mr. Ringling, head of the Barnum show, to allow the Lasky Company to use part of the Barnum equipment, and being refused permission, Apfel engaged a one-ring circus travelling through Southern California, to spend a week at the Lasky studio, where their entire equipment was used for the interior scenes of the "Rose of the Rancho."

On Wednesday evening of the week in which the circus was used, Mr. Apfel, threw the circus doors wide open to the public, free, and in consequence secured an audience of four thousand people, which was highly important to the production.

"The Rose in the Ring" will be released by the Lasky Company through Paramount Pictures Corporation, during the second Paramount quarter.

"THE GIRL FROM THE WEST" (Lubin).

This, the fifth episode in "The Beloved Adventurer" series, is a very pathetic story. The good Lord Cecil seems to be the butt of misfortune and the more he strives to make others happy, the more he is subjected to the conspiracies of rascals. In this he resorts to the last expedient to raise money selling the family jewels of his ancestors, and raises $25,000, really a small amount to help out his embarrassments, but offers safety for awhile. By the work of a confidence man he loses even this and discovers that he has bought the controlling stock in a worthless mine. The situation is heartrending, but Cecil never loses his nerve, and again fights the fate that so cruelly oppresses him. Emmett Campbell Hall continues to prove his ability as a romancer, and Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe famous Lubin players.

Jos. S. Edelman.

A Few Facts About Recently Appointed Advertising Director of the World Film Corporation.

FRESH from his success with Joseph P. Day, the world's famous real estate auctioneer and the campaigns by which the Ingersoll's made famous the line, "The watch that made the dollar famous," Jos. S. Edelman has been chosen the advertising director of the World Film Corporation.

Jos. S. Edelman.

Mr. Edelman is president of the Sterling Advertising Service, but he will not sever his relations with that service in taking charge of the position of advertising director of the World Film Corporation. Mr. Edelman will be responsible for the productions on all the advertising that will be gotten out for the various features distributed by the World Film Corporation.

Since Mr. Edelman has directed advertising campaigns of many successful commercial firms he will bring to his department of the World Film Corporation, the wealth of experience that will surely mark a step forward in the producing of printed matter for feature films, as he himself says in describing his plans. "I hope to do for the World Film Corporation advertising, what the moving picture directors done for the films, by their 'close up' method. I intend to concentrate the results on the posters, by using the most artistic means possible. There has been no parallel development in the advertising of films that has kept step with the wonderful development of film production. The result has been that the best work is secured and by getting close to the film itself, one can see that printed matter is a matter of prime importance. There is a crying need for posters that have the imprint, of thought and ability. It is not alone in all the lithographic work that must appear on the billboards, but also on the heralds and cuts, that attracts the public. In the material gotten out at present, there is little that can be recommended, yet what is more important than advertising matter to draw an audience?"

Mr. Edelman believes strongly in a very simple and effective poster. To make sure that such work is produced, he will devote himself entirely to this work, and the moving picture world will see some interesting results in the advertising matter of O. A. C. Lund's picture, "When Broadway Was a Trail," in which Barbara Tennant is featured.

GLEICHMAN OUT OF WORLD FILM.

Phil. Gleichman, to whom credit should be given for pioneering Exchanges for the economical handling of Feature Films, has withdrawn from the World Film Corporation. It was greatly through his efforts that the Worlds Special Feature Films Corporation was formed about a year ago, an organization which through its winning policy met with instantaneous success. After this company was changed to World Film Corporation, Mr. Gleichman served as Vice-President and has just sold his interests and withdrawn to give his time and attention to another proposition that he has under consideration, but which he could not be induced to make public at this time.

San Antonio Man Does Things.

Building a Closed and an Open Theater with Aggregate Capacity of 4,000—Leases Brady Playhouse for Pictures.

W. J. LYTLE of San Antonio, Texas, who is financially interested in a number of moving picture theaters in that city, will open respectively about November 15 and December 1 a Brady playhouse and a big closed picture theater with a roof garden which will be used as an open-air moving-picture theater in the summertime, the combined seating capacity of closed and open theaters being 4,000 persons. In regard to the latter mentioned amusement places each will have a seating capacity of 2,000. Associated with Mr. Lytle in this enterprise are Martin Wright and C. T. Fincham. The house will, however, be under the management of Mr. Lytle. Reinforced concrete, steel and tile are being used in the building, the dimensions of which are 100 by 150 feet.

The Brady theater, now building at the corner of Houston and St. Mary's streets, San Antonio, has also been leased by Mr. Lytle for the presentation of moving pictures for a period of fifteen years. The rental for this structure is $20,000 per year. The lease only covers the theater, and the rest of the building will be rented by Mr. Brady. According to the terms of the lease Mr. Lytle specified the interior decorations and the heating and ventilation systems to be installed. Although the structure is primarily designed to be a big moving picture theater, a stage large enough to accommodate any vaudeville, stock or opera production is being provided for. The ventilation system will change 30,000 cubic feet of air per minute, and all air before it gets into the auditorium will be pumped through water. The air will come up under each seat through a mushroom-shaped ventilator, while the foul air will be carried out through the roof by exhaust fans. The total number of seats will be 2,016, apportioned to the different parts of the house as follows: On the ground or parquet floor there will be 813, on the first balcony 603, on the second balcony 400, and in the ten boxes 200.

A part of the equipment will consist of two Power's No. 6A machines and a Radium Gold Fibre screen, with a ten-foot velvet frame. The throw will be 90 feet, and the size of the picture projected will be 15 by 21 feet. An organ, costing between $10,000 and $15,000, will furnish the music, and until such an instrument has been purchased, as Mr. Lytle says that the climate affects certain makes of organs and he has to be very careful in selecting the right one, a ten-piece orchestra will be employed. The location of the new theater is considered the best in the city, as every car line either passes or transfers to the line which goes by the door. This house will be ready for the public about November 15. The owners of the lease are W. J. Lytle and Messrs. Apostolon and Nicholas.

Who Wants Gunning?

F. C. GUNNING, the well-known film executive and advertising specialist, says he wants to receive some interesting phone calls before October 19. The wherefore is this. "F. C." has been managing William Morris big New York theater at Broadway and 45th street since his forced, hurried return from Europe with the Sid Olcott producing party. The policy at the New York has been high class features and selected short subjects at a fifty cent admission.

F. C. Gunning.

But—and here is the answer, just as "F. C." was getting things nicely started, along comes A. H. Woods looking for a big house in which to place John Mason, who is starring in a new production. Mr. Woods made Mr. Morris a proposition that could not be refused and so on October 19 the New York becomes a legitimate house for the winter season. Consequently on the 19th "F. C." wants to shake hands with a new boss.

He would prefer to talk on a proposition as booking and advertising manager of a chain of theaters and his experience certainly fits him for such an executive position. He has some real ideas for such work that will net some one nice profits.

"Wid" Gunning came to New York a few years ago after seven years newspaper editorial and advertising experience and two years managing his own theater in the middle west. By putting his pleasing, sincere personality back of the management of the sales and advertising for the American Eclair Co. he succeeded in winning real recognition in New York as well as big results for Eclair.

When the new Warner's Features, Inc., was organized in 1913, "F. C." was made assistant general manager, acting as the practical man in the buying and editing of all films and the preparation of the lithographs and lobby displays.

Mr. Gunning is generally acknowledged as one of the sincere students of the film business and an advertising specialist. His experience has fitted him for an executive position requiring exceptional film and advertising knowledge and his reputation as a fast and intelligent worker has long been established.

Since a youngster of fourteen "F. C." has kept busy without intermission. He will undoubtedly get some of those interesting phone calls and letters before the 19th. Men who work as if they enjoyed it and work intelligently are needed.

Jack Delmar, general manager of the new booking office of the Exhibitors' League, Philadelphia, has resigned from that position, and will devote his time to the two houses of which he has charge.

Notes of the Trade

IN LOS ANGELES, California, there is one of the oddest street car systems in the world. Part street car and part elevator; it conveys people up "Angles' Flight." Christie has used it for the production of the latest of his Nestor screams, "Their Ups and Downs," featuring the unimitable trio, Victoria Forde, Eddie Lyons and Lee Moran.

That saying was all right during our copy-book days in the little red schoolhouse, but it stands no more, since the production of Al Christie's latest one-reel, "When the Mummy Cried for Help." There is one thing in it that is old and that is the two-thousand-year-old mummy who plays the lead.

CINCINNATI.

WHILE the weather lately has been more summery than the week or so experienced early in September, the attendance at Cincinnati motion picture houses, which increased with a rush at that time, has shown no tendency toward falling off. On the contrary, nearly every house in town is experiencing phenomenal attendance, which, in some respects, is hard to explain. Cincinnati has felt the general business depression, added to considerably by that due to the war, perhaps more than most cities, and many men are out of work. Yet, there is no lack of prosperity, judging by the excellen criterion of the attendance at amusement places. It speaks well for the prospects of exhibitors during the coming winter, with the practical certainty of better business in all quarters, and of consequently increased prosperity here and elsewhere.

The Orpheum, the big Walnut Hills house which had such a successful summer, an whose winter season opened so auspiciously last week, is finding Sunday business remarkably heavy. On Sunday the crowds drawn by "The Stain," the six-reel Eclectic production, equalled those of the week before, when Francis X. Bushman, in "One Wonderful Night," was the attraction. Crowds waited outside the doors of the biggest house in town—as the Orpheum is—from one performance to another, keeping it filled all afternoon and evening.

A rumor that Manager "Bob" Laws, local head of the General Film Co., is preparing to make a change, which will place him in charge of another film office, is understood to be entirely baseless, as Mr. Laws expresses himself as bein quite satisfied with his present position.

The aristocratic game of polo engaged the attention of Cincinnati's social elite a few days ago, when the Cincinnati team met that from Cleveland, and the motion-picture man was on the job at the same time, so that all last week the multitude, attending Keith's theater, saw the game reproduced with remarkable fidelity, with other local scenes. "Cincinnati in Motion," as the weekly series is called, bids fair to be an even more popular feature at the popular theter this season than it was last.

Lack of realism cannot well be charged against motion pictures, as compared with the drama of the speaking stage, after the death in Cincinnati last week of Wesley Tulbert, a colored man, who dropped dead in the gallery of the Lyceum theater, on Central avenue, during the exhibition of a particularly exciting picture. The coroner's examination developed the fact that the death was due to heart failure, brough on, presumably, by excitement.

The repairing of the Scenic theater, at Ironton, O., the floor of which collapsed recently for some unknown cause, has been completed, the hole made by the accident being filled with concrete, supported by pillars of the same material, so that it is now practically impossible for a similar fall to occur.

The Victoria airdome, in Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, which is no longer an airdome since the cool weather began, save on pleasant evenings, had adopted the plan of having two bargain evenings a week, Mondays and Thursdays being selected for this purpose. On these evenings the price of admission is reduced from ten to five cents for adults. The plan has worked remarkably well in bringing attendance above the former marks for these evenings, and will probably be continued all winter. Large houses are the rule at the Victoria nowadays, however, especially on Saturdays and Sundays.

The Moving Film Advertiser Co. has been organized at Cleveland, O., with a capital stock of $10,000, for the purpose of handling motion-picture advertising work. Those interested are C. Stockton, R. W. Spring, R. G. Dodge, Margaret Hill and J. O. Brooks.

The church of St. Ann's, at Youngstown, O., is one of the latest to join the ranks of those showing motion pictures to their people as educational and appropriate entertainment. A production of "Joan of Arc" was among the pictures shown on Sunday afternoon and evening, while comedy numbers of a high order were also offered.

The Lyric, of Piqua, O., has adopted an unusual business-building stunt, establishing the custom of offering an occasional ladies' night, on which ladies are admitted free of charge. The plan has worked well, of course, resulting in packed houses on the evenings selected, and also helping out the attendance on other nights, as it serves to make "picture fans" and thus keep them coming.

The management of the La Max theater, at Wilmington, O., is one of those following the wise and profitable policy of anouncing its full week's program in advance through the papers, thus enabling its patrons to note coming attractions and attend accordingly, instead of relying upon their dropping in by chance. Enough details of each production are given to enable readers to know what to expect, and results have been such as to justify the cost of the space used abundantly.

The Parsons & Hendricks Amusement Co., recently organized at Hendricks, W. Va., is planning the construction of one or more motion picture houses in that part of the state. The company has a capital stock of $1,000.

CASEY.

KENTUCKY

CONDITIONS in the moving picture business of Louisville have never been better, according to authorities in the business. A number of high-class feature productions have been shown at the local houses during the past few weeks and every one is making money. Although the early part of the summer was extremely hot, August and September were two of the coolest months ever known for that time of year in Louisville, and the local playhouses have been cool and comfortable. It was so cool in the city during the last ten days of September that the office buildings were compelled to supply heat, which is the first time such a thing ever happened before October 1.

Lee Goldberg, manager of the Mary Anderson theater, Louisville, which is now showing motion pictures exclusively, has dropped the admission price at his matinee shows to ten cents and placed the sale for the night exhibitions at ten and twenty cents.

Edward Abele, in the big Lasky production, "The Making of Bobby Burnit," proved a great success at the Majestic theater, where the films were shown September 24 to 26. This house is having eight shows daily just now, and is offering nothing but high-class feature productions, which are going very well. It was almost impossible to seat the big Saturday night crowds at the "Bobby Burnitt" show.

Manager D. Levenson, of the Novelty theater, Louisville, was very much put out last week when a section of a big serial which he is running failed to show up in time. Heavy advertising had been done, and good crowds were coming weekly to see the serial. No good feature was to be obtained, and the pictures from the day before had to be run after a permit had been granted by the leasing company. Over fifty dollars' worth of tickets had to be returned to patrons who had seen the film the day before. No cash was turned back, but tickets were, which amounted to the same thing. The films finally reached the city at 6 o'clock in the evening. The delay was charged to one of the messenger boys of the film concern. This sort of thing has happened several times in the past few months, and according to Mr. Levenson the producers of serial films will have to make better arrangements for prompt delivery if they wish to be successful with their productions.

J. J. Musselman, manager of the Clifton theater, has given up his position to reopen the Arcadia Dance Hall, at Fourth and Broadway, which will shortly have a motion picture house under its roof.

Maggard-Bradley, Inc., of Morehead, Ky., are now placing in large quantities their new projecting machine, which is made especially for commercial and entertainment work. The whole machine weighs twenty-five pounds and is fitted in a hand-carrying case. Carpenter & Johnson, of Louisville, camera men and entertainment exhibitors, recently purchased one of the "Cosmograph" model 14, type A machines, with which they are very well satisfied. The boys have taken the local agency for the machine, and have disposed of several.

J. J. Hebbert, who had about closed a deal for the Jefferson theater, of Jeffersonville, Ind., gave up the deal at the last moment because of some unexpected developments regarding the old fixtures of the house. He purchased a new Studebaker car in place of a show house, and is well satisfied with the deal, as he now plans to solicit film service for the Warner Company with the car.

At a directors' meeting of the Fourth Avenue Amusement Company, held last week, it was decided to christen its new show house the "Alamo." A number of names were suggested, but after a process of elimination the latter name was chosen. The contractors have been making rapid progress during the past three weeks, and the house will be ready to be opened November 1 unless some unforeseen obstacle presents itself.

The Thoroughbred Film Corporation was recently incorporated in Louisville for $50,000. The stock is divided into shares of $10 each. It is the intention of the concern to manufacture films and other articles for motion picture shows. The indebtedness is unlimited. The incorporators are: D. W. Boner, five shares; Harry Plock and J. Reginald Clements, three shares each. At present the organizers are selling stock and plan to start manufacturing in the near future.

The Vaudo Amusement Company, of Louisville, recently filed amended articles of incorporation, increasing its capital stock from $1,500 to $5,000.

The Guernee Amusement Company, of Louisville, recently leased the Ada Meade theater from the Lexington Theater Company, of Lexington, Ky., and is operating Keith vaudeville and pictures.

The Kentucky State Board of Agriculture engaged the Industrial Moving Picture Company, of Chicago, to take moving pictures of the Kentucky State Fair, which was held in Louisville recently. These pictures will be exhibited all over the state and at the country fairs next season. A number of the principal events were filmed by J. Rice Eiple, director for the industrial company. About 1,000 feet of film was used on a good roads meeting, and the prize winners at the dog, horse, cattle and poultry exhibits were also shown.

The Northcutt Mercantile Company, of Cynthiana, Ky., has made an arrangement with Rohs' Opera House, whereby a free ticket of admission to the motion picture show is given away with every pair of ladies' or children's shoes purchased during the fall season. The idea is an unusually good one and is making money for both concerns.

Bids were recently advertised for remodeling the Capital theater and City Hall building at Frankfort, Ky. The theater building is owned by the city and all bids had to be addressed to City Clerk W. S. Rossen, who is also chairman of the hall committee. L. L. Oberwarth was the architect.

TENNESSEE

IN spite of poor marketing conditions for the vast crop of cotton in Memphis and other Tennessee cities which depend almost entirely on the cotton business, the motion picture industry is going right ahead and business is good. Practically the whole of the South is suffering on account of the European war, which has killed the exportations of cotton, but the moving picture house is something that has come to stay, and the low prices charged for admission draw good crowds where regular plays or vaudeville would fail.

A new motion picture theater, to be known as the Alcazar, is nearing completion in Chattanooga. The new show house is located on Market street and the company which formerly operated the Lyric theater will be in charge of the new house. The house was expected to open during the week of September 21, but several delays were encountered and the opening had to be postponed. The name Alcazar, which means the theater beautiful, has in no way been misapplied in naming this house, as it is handsome throughout. Lawrence Smith, who organized the Lyric Company and managed the old house, will not be manager when the new one is opened. Arthur S. Dickinson will succeed him. A contract has been signed with the Paramount Film Company for its releases and they will be shown.

That Chattanooga people will be given the preference as far as possible by the Photoplay Library Corporation was recently evidenced when announcement was made that Walter M. Cline, formerly staff photographer for the News, would be one of the cameramen of the company. The moving picture business is not a new one for for Mr. Cline. One of the first films made by the Photoplay Library Corporation will be for Chattanooga and East Tennessee exhibition only, and will consist entirely of Chattanooga scenes. Byron Parl, managing director of the company, who recently returned to Chattanooga, said that his company would produce a film for the purpose of giving the Chattanooga people a practical demonstration of the company's work. The exact plot of the film has not yet been decided upon, but it will have enough to be interesting, and will show some of the prettiest natural scenes near the city, as well as streets, office buildings and manufacturing plants. It has been sugested that a session of the city commission be included in the film, but this is one of the details not yet taken up with the "city fathers." One of the city schools will be included if permission can be obtained from Commissioner Evans. Mr. Park says that this film will not be more than 1,000 feet and that it will not exploit any special interest. It will be shown at one or more of the local houses, and no attempt will be made to give it a large distribution. On account of the interest displayed by various towns throughout Eastern Kentucky and Tennessee about two years ago, when a proposed industrial film of Chattanooga was suggested, it is possible that the work of the Photoplay Corporation will be shown complimentarily throughout the section.

The electric lights on new white-way arch, leading from State street to the Columbia theater, in Bristol, Tenn., was recently turned on for the first time. This attractive arrangement adds materially to the lighting system of the immediate vicinity, and is highly comendatory to the progressive spirit of L. Morse, manager of the Columbia. The orchestra and band girls with Billy Clifford's attraction had the honor of formally turning on the lights.

Plans for a new motion picture theater, to be the first of a chain of five theaters to be erected in Memphis by the National Photoplay Theaters Company, of Memphis, have been prepared by Mahan & Broadwell, architects. Construction work on the first theater of the chain will start shortly. Messrs. Good, Jones and McMahon, members of the company's building committee, have not decided whether the first theater will be erected on Madison avenue or on Union avenue. Both lots are well out in the residence district. The first theater will be of fireproof construction and will cost about $10,000. It will have a glazed terra cotta front and will have a seating capacity of 500. The building will be equipped with a cooling and ventilating system, operated by fans and a refrigeration plant in the basement. A vaudeville stage will also be provided. The building will be built on the modified Spanish mission style.

R. M. Shaw, president of the Tennessee Industrial Film Company, of Knoxville, has advertised for bids on various materials for construction of a new building to cost $8,000. Special attention will be given to the skylight features and the lighting equipment.

A plan was recently broached to the City Commission of Nashville by S. I. Connor, representing the Bon Ton Film Company, which for some time past has been taking pictures for the Tennessee exhibits at the San Francisco Exposition, for defraying the expenses of "filming" the schools and school children of Nashville. He proposed that medals be made up with the seal of Tennessee on one side and the seal of the Panama-Pacific Exposition on the other side, and that they be sold to the school children of Nashville at about fifty cents. In this way he thought the city could avoid the necessity of paying for the pictures out of the municipal treasury. The Commissioners thought well of the proposal, and it is probable that it will be adopted. Mr. Connor said that he would shortly reach picture taking in the city hall. It is his intention to make a clean sweep, including in his films glimpses of all of the Commissioners at work in their offices, the Commissioners in meeting, the working forces of all of the municipal departments, the City Tax Assessor in the heat of an argument with some aggrieved taxpayer and other characteristic city hall scenes. GEORGE.

ILLINOIS

BUSINESS for the Springfield houses during the Illinois State Fair was not up to the standard of former years. This is partly accounted for by the smaller crowds at the exposition this year and partly by the fact that local patronage was, in most cases, cut off on account of increased prices. The usual protests were made and the usual statements made by city officials that they were powerless to prevent an increase in prices. The correspondent of the Moving Picture World heard that the Princess, a ten cent house ,did not raise its prices. The Princess made a bid for the out-of-town patronage. It made the statement that it was opened since the last state fair, which coupled with the announcement that regular prices would prevail, was significant. Parcels were checked free. All but one of the Springfield houses which were running serials postponed them in order to grab a part of the transient trade. For years past it has been the custom during fair week to "get money" and as a rule the business has been conducted more on the plane of street carnival shows than as legitimate value-giving photoplay theaters. Shows were speeded up until the screen looked ridiculous, but the idea was to get the crowds out to make way for those constantly coaxed in by the bally-hoos. A show that will give value in fair time is bound to make a lot of permanent friends.

Moving pictures of the Labor Day parade at Davenport, Ia., were shown at the Mirror theater, in Moline, the sister city of Davenport.

The films of the centennial celebration parade and bridge which were made at Belleville were given their premier showing at the Washington theater in that city.

F. A. Pelley, of Pelley, Fitzpatrick & McElroy, owners of the circuit which includes the Barrison theater at Waukegan, has been managing that house, while E. J. Miller has been at Benton Harbor, Mich., supervising the construction of the new vaudeville and picture house which the syndicate will open there. Miller has watched the construction and helped open six houses for the firm and is familiar with its pattern.

The Globe theater introduced the moving picture cameraman to Sullivan. The management had a reel made which is to be shown soon at the Globe.

Francis M. Cunningham, an evangelist proclaiming the glories of Zion City, is using moving pictures of the unusual rites observed by Wilbur Glenn Voliva's followers at Zion City. He has been holding services at Glasford, Kingston and other mining towns in the vicinity of Peoria.

The Litchfield News-Herald, which is carrying the story of "Lucille Love" while the film is run at the Royal theater, had one of the most striking advertisements used for the serial by any Illinois theater. It ran across the tops of two pages, an unusual and painstaking practice for a small city paper.

The Barrison theater at Waukegan gave a special program for a number of visiting postmasters and their employees, who were holding a convention in the city.

The Village Board at Milan has granted a license to Fred O. Slenker to conduct a moving picture show.

Dreamland theater at Roodhouse tried the stunt of having a man with a camera take pictures of local residents and then showing the pictures that night.

The Grand theater at Aurora has been leased by Allman & Colby, who operate moving picture houses at St. Charles, Batavia and elsewhere, and the end of the "legitimate" era for the Grand is near. The change in management was slated for October 1. Peter Allman will be in charge of the house. L. A. Constantine has been manager.

The Village Board at Milan has ordered an ordinance drawn which will govern the operation of moving picture theaters.

Lawrence Watkins, who recently opened the Elite theater at Petersburg, has added Watkin's orchestra as a musical feature.

The moving picture theater which has been conducted in the Foreman Building at Barrington has been discontinued because of lack of patronage and the equipment has been removed.

Moving picture shows will be given in the opera house at Maquon three nights each week this winter.

The Gem theater at Altamont was given over September 28 to a free moving picture show under the auspices of the Illinois State Pure Food Commission.

George Arends of Melvin contemplates erecting a new moving picture theater at that place.

Theatrical performances have been ended at the Airdome operated in Weldon by Holcomb & Bogardus. Holcomb will operate a moving picture show in Weldon this winter.

The Midget theater, Manager Schneider, has been opened at Metamora.

The Chicago Herald movies' cameraman was at Galesburg and caught Theodore Roosevelt on one of his important Illinois engagements. The Gaiety at Galesburg has been showing the Herald movies and thereby got a local picture.

Charles A. Conley has sold the Majestic theater at La Salle to W. H. Taylor of Peoria and has returned to Monmouth.

Arthur Pierson and Otto Bryant have opened a moving picture show at Radin and will give an exhibition every Saturday night.

Carl Malone of the Grand theater at Robinson has purchased a moving picture camera and has been making local films, as well as visiting the surrounding towns. These pictures will be shown first at the Grand. Later the neighboring towns will use them.

The Ouatoga theater at Upper Alton has been given over to the "Creation" pictures of the I. B. S. A.

The Ideal theater in the east end of Princeton is reported to have changed hands.

The Pythian theater at Marshall is now giving five reels of pictures for five cents.

Scott's theater at Jacksonville tried the plan of showing 100 different pictures of Jacksonville people on the screen each night for two or three nights.

The Capitol theater on East Washington street in Springfield recently offered its patrons the Electrophone Talking Pictures.

A reel of local pictures, which took the patrons through a big shoe factory in Dixon, was shown by the Family theater in that city.

"The moving picture theater manager who permits whistling to go on in his house will soon find the better class of women and elderly men avoiding attending that particular place of entertainment. There is nothing that 'gets' the average person as to hear shrill whistles coming from various parts of the house," says the Waukegan Sun.

In order to get a crowd out to hear Raymond Robins, Progressive candidate for United States Senator from Illinois, the committee on arrangements at Belleville gave a free moving picture show at the Lyric theater, where the meeting was held.

James W. Bennett has leased the Rose opera house at Lacon for the coming season.

David Mitchell, who for six years was in the moving picture business at Farmer City, has reopened the old Star theater at 210 East Main street in Clinton under the name of the Scenic.

The Princess theater at Mt. Carroll has inaugurated Saturday matinees for school children. Children under fourteen years of age are admitted for three cents.

A moving picture show has been opened in the hall at Penfield.

The Air Dome moving picture theater at Riverside Park, McHenry, has been torn down. The moving picture shows are now given at the Central Opera House.

"A moving picture theater for the poorer class," is the rumored policy of a house to be opened in what is known as the "old iron steps building" on East Main street in Urbana. It seems that not all patronage is welcomed in other houses, but in the new one "the color line will not be drawn and overalls will be more aceptable than spike tails. The colored population has no place to see the movies and the lowly whites who disdain ablutions are similarly inconvenienced."

Charles Lurgio, who has been operator at the Rose theater in Minonk since its opening, has resigned and gone to Chicago. He is succeeded by Samuel Knight.

Milford Goodrich has opened a moving picture show at Thawville.

Mistakes in the shipping departments of the exchanges are causing all kinds of trouble for the small city managers who are running the serials. These errors are more numeous than seems warranted. The smaller city patrons take the continued stories more eagerly than in the metropolitan theaters and when an emergency program is thrown on the screen are disappointed. And it is not always that a manager is able to announce to his patrons before they enter the house that the proper installment of the serial has gone astray. Last week one manager found he was showing the twelfth episode of a serial instead of the eleventh. Another got his reel case, found the reel marked as a part of the serial, but when it was projected to a crowded house it was part of the regular service. Both were busy for two days explaining how it happened, making public apologies.

Manager Glen Reynolds of the Princess theater at De Kalb has decided to give the Renfax Musical motion pictures a try-out.

Films of the Labor Day parade at Peoria were shown at the Duchess theater in that city.

The Illinois State Journal is making the claim that it is the moving picture paper of Springfield. Three out of four dailies in Springfield are well patronized by the exhibitors. Springfield was one of the first towns in which the photoplay theaters were advertised and the use of newspaper space has been persistent for years but seldom spectacular.

F. C. Mayberry of Hannibal, Mo., who took some snapshots around Carrollton for use on the screen at the Royal theater there, arrived in town on a busy election day and got plenty of subjects.

The Kunz Opera House at Pinckneyville has been leased by W. R. Drummonds of Anna, who has overhauled the house. The new management announces theatrical attractions and musical comedies, but it is doubtful if Pinckneyville will thrive on a steady diet of these shows.

The Acme Theaters Company of Chicago has been incorporated with a capital stock of $10,000 to do a moving picture theater and amusement business. The incorporators are Richard H. Hollen, John A. Massen and M. H. Forner.

The Werner Theater at Peru was dark one night owing to the death of Henry Werner. Mr. Werner was interested in the house and the show was closed out of respect to his memory.

Women of the Presbyterian church at Tuscola gave a special show of the feature "Samson" at the Airdome at that place.

A. B. Campbell of Hardin has purchased moving picture equipment and will operate a show in the town hall at that place.

The Lyric Theater on Seventh street in East Moline has been taken over by Grant Fair of that city, who has had the house overhauled. He will personally manage it as a moving pictuer theater.

"The Price of Human Lives," the anti-tuberculosis film, will be shown in one of the Quincy houses this fall as a part of a local movement to secure a sanitarium for those afflicted with phthisis.

A "Ladies' Gift Day" was a recent stunt at the Majestic Theater at Bloomington. Every lady who attended the matinee was given a cook book, a can of baking powder and a box of face powder. DETROIT.

COURTEOUS treatment on the part of ushers and doormen is one of the biggest assets of a moving picture house, according to T. D. Moule, manager of the Liberty theater. He states that it is difficult to find young men who seem to know how to handle the public and to take the right attitude. "I have to keep instructing my boys all the time that they can make themselves more valuable to the house by being polite, courteous and showing a kindly disposition to every one who comes in, whether they wear diamonds or a black shirt. Even the common laborer appreciates a smile and a kind word. Most ushers "fall all over themselves" to be courteous to a pretty girl and extend them special attention, but we aim to treat everybody who enters our theater alike. If a man or woman comes in and there happens to be no seat vacant, we want our boys to say so in a nice way instead of being gruff about it; in other words, the employes of any enterprise, whether its a retail store or a moving picture theater, should be made to realize that the man in business needs the public more than the public needs him and that he cannot afford to take the attitude of being indifferent or independent as to whether the public trade with him or not. It's surprising how far a little smile to your regular theater patrons will go in making them feel that their patronage is appreciated. Edward Werner is the new orchestra leader at the Liberty.

The Continental features which heretofore have been handled through the Cleveland office of the Mutual Film Corporation will hereafter be handled through the Detroit office for local distribution. Of course, those for sale in Cleveland will still be sold through the Cleveland office.

Owing to the growth in business, the Detroit office of the Mutual Film Corporation has just been remodeled, the size of the reception room being made smaller, so as to give more room for the mechanical departments.

Moving pictures were employed to exploit the attraction of Bert Baker and his show, which appeared at the Gayety theater the week of September 27. The entire company had been photographed some weeks previously at the stage door of the Columbia theater in New York, together with officials of the Columbia Amusement Co. These pictures are shown in the various burlesque theaters one week in advance of the show playing there. Walt M. Leslie, an enterprising advertising agent, is in charge of the pictures.

Although the Washington theater is now playing pictures continuously from 2:30 p. m. to 11 p. m. daily, it is likely that the three-a-day policy may later be established as the permanent policy. The Washington is away from the regular transient district and has few people passing its doors from 4:30 until 7 p. m. However, this condition might change when the new Statler hotel and the other big buildings in the neighborhood of Grand Circus Park are completed and in operation.

The Marquette Amusement Company, of Detroit, has been incorporated for $100,000 to build a moving picture theater in East Jefferson avenue near the Belle Isle bridge approach. The men behind the project are Frederick Ingersoll, Francis O. Gaukler and A. C. Stellwagan. A part of the stock will be offered to the public at par. The theater will be known as the "Knickerbocker" and work will be started this fall. The company has a 40-year lease on the property. The theater will seat over a thousand; it will be heated by a forced warm air system and cooled with washed air. It is planned to open the theater in May. The property has a frontage of 113 feet on Jefferson avenue. Of this 63 feet will be used for the theater and 50 feet for a smaller structure to house an amusement to be known as "Hunting in the Ozarks."

Col. W. S. Butterfield, general manager of the Bijou Enterprise Co., who formerly had his office and residence in Battle Creek, has removed them to Chicago.

The Miles theater during the world's series between the Athletics and Boston baseball teams will show all the plays by means of the electric automatic score board.

The week of October 11 at the Washington theater will be for lovers of Mary Pickford. Manager Pierce has booked three features, in which Miss Pickford has the principal role. "The Eagle's Mate" will come for three days, "Caprice" for two and "Tess of the Storm Country" for the last two days.

The proposed Strand theater in Fairview will not be started until the spring.

The new Alhambra at Woodward and Kenilworth will probably be ready by November 1.

Manager Starr of the New Empire had so many requests for "My Official Wife," which he showed on September 21, that he repeated it on October 8. "The Fortune Hunter" proved such a success on September 27 that he repeated it on October 1. SMITH.

BUFFALO.

MANAGER DAVIS of Keith's moving picture theater, Buffalo, is showing many scenes of European cities. War photographs in front of his house also attract many patrons. Mr. Davis is a strong advocate of a four-reel show. He says if a longer show is given regularly there are sure to be repeaters and inferior pictures, which help to drive away patronage.

A. R. Sherry has resigned as manager of the Hippodrome moving picture theater, Buffalo, to take up a private business.

W. G. Kaliska will manage a moving picture house, to be opened in Philadelphia by the Keystone Amusement Company. Mr. Kaliska was formerly manager of the Allendale theater, Buffalo.

L. G. Edel of Buffalo has been appointed Massachusetts representative of the Electric Feature Film Company. He was formerly manager of the feature departments of the General Film Company in St. Louis and Memphis.

The new Regent moving picture theater at Main street, near Utica street, Buffalo, was recently opened by the United Picture Theaters, Ltd., headed by Messrs. Mark and Brock of that city. Arthur C. Willats is resident manager. There is a $10,000 organ and an orchestra under the direction of Henry Marcus, an experienced musician. In its interior arrangement and decorations the Regent is one of the most beautiful and complete theaters in the country. The house has a seating capacity of 1,300, with all seats on the ground floor, there being no balcony. The seating arrangement is perfect, with an inclined floor that assures a perfect view of the stage from every section of the house. The walls and ceilings are paneled, with the centers of the panels finished in imperial purple, borders in old ivory and with gold finished trimmings. An elaborate stage setting, in keeping with the other fine decorative features, has been installed. Indirect lighting is employed. The seats are finished in leather and are comfortable and roomy. There are sixteen boxes, four at each side of the front of the house and eight at the rear. The foyer is beautifully finished. It is the announced policy of the Regent to display only the finest and cleanest productions in moving pictures, providing an atmosphere of culture and refinement. The house will cater not only to the grown-ups, but also to the young folks and has set aside every Saturday afternoon for a special children's performance.

Special moving pictures of farm scenes in the Genesee Valley, N. Y., and adjacent territory are being prepared for the Panama-Pacific Exposition, as part of the New York State exhibit.

Moving pictures will be among the features to be offered in the Delmar Garden, a $40,000 amusement resort to be built at Culver road and Hinsdale street, Rochester, N. Y. Application for a permit to build the structure has been made.

Moving pictures showing repairs being made to the Federal Telephone Company's Buffalo plant were recently taken. In connection with the pictures the company made this announcement: "The film will be preserved as a pictorial record of the most remarkable instance of rejuvenation in telephone history—the re-establishment of a big city telephone service within ten days after its almost complete destruction by fire."

Moving pictures of the Chemung County Fair at Elmira, N. Y., were shown later at the Majestic theater in that city. BILLY BISON.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

"JOE" MORGAN, of the Princess theater, at Twelfth and H streets, Northeast, is sending out a neat circular letter to the residents of his section, stating that "owing to the numerous requests for some of the large feature productions of three, four and five reels in length we have decided to present special feature program on Wednesday of each week. These features will be personally selected by the management and only the best obtainable will be shown. As a much larger expense is incurred in securing these features it will be necessary to make the price of admission on Special Feature Nights ten cents for adults and five cents for children. We feel sure that our patrons will be well satisfied, as these same pictures are being shown at the Vitagraph, Strand and other large Broadway theaters at prices ranging from 25 cents up * * *." The Special Feature Night program was inaugurated with the presentation of "Shadows of the Past" and a good business resulted

The children of Washington are greatly grieved at the plight of the little war orphans of Europe and are doing considerable good work to aid in the fitting out of a Christmas ship, the cargo of which is to consist of clothing, toys and games for those in these foreign countries who will have no one else to provide for them. Lawn parties have been given and efforts made along other lines to secure funds for this purpose. Fred Stein, of the Maycroft theater, has been watching the efforts of the little folks with a great deal of interest, and believing that the movement should receive the encouragement of the adults, he offered his airdome for a benefit performance. The General Film Company has also realized the worthiness of the cause and donated, through Mr. Mayer, the manager of the Washington office, the five-reel feature, "The Lion and the Mouse," and a good two-reel comedy. Not to be outdone by these, the attaches of the park have proffered their services for the occasion. As a result of this action on the part of Mr. Stein, thousands of tickets, bearing the following inscription, are being sold by the kiddies of the neighborhood: "A Special Feature Show Will Be Given Wednesday, October 7, 7 to 9 o'clock p. m., at the 'Maycroft,' 621-623 H Street Northeast, For the Benefit of the War Orphans of Europe Under the Auspices of Santa Claus Ship Club No. 1. Admission 10 cents. If weather is inclement the show will be given the next good night." In line with this it is pleasing to note that other exhibitors are lending their aid, for they bought tickets, not one or two, but in blocks of ten or more. A further encouragement is being given by the downtown merchants and departments stores, who are offering prizes to the youngsters selling the most tickets, and the newspapers are giving the movement wide publicity.

"Bill" Alvine, formerly manager of the Virginia, has assumed the management of the Regent theater, at Eighteenth and California streets, Northwest, operated by Mrs. Brane and Miss Cohen.

John J. Noonan, proprietor of the Virginia theater, is in New York on business connected with his various interests in this city.

It is rumored around town that Ninth street is to have another moving picture theater, this new house to be located in the vicinity of M street. It seems that inquiries have been made with respect to obtaining service for such a place, but no other information is at present available.

Washington's picture theater-going fans seem to have taken up the stamp craze and the Leader and Crandall's theaters on Ninth street are making a neat little profit from the sale of albums and the large stamps which bear the likenesses of the various photoplay stars. The albums are sold at fifteen cents each, while the stamps are offered at the rate of two perforated sheets, each containing six pictures, for five cents. When made up, a set of these albums is very attractive.

Fred Robyn, of the Simplex Company, and F. W. Swett, traveling representative of the Nicholas Power Company, gave exhibitions with their machines at the headquarters of the local branch of the I. A. T. S. E. last week for the benefit of the operators who belong to this union. The exhibitions were well attended and the operators obtained much valuable information as to the working of these machines and many hints on proper projection.

Peter Lasky, of the Baltimore Film Exchange, was a visitor at the offices of the Washington Film Exchange.

"Tom" Eastwood, who was formerly manager of the Apollo theater and of the Dixie theater, both on H street, Northeast, has leased the Truxton theater, at North Capitol street and Florida avenue, from Dr. Coblentz. A number of improvements have been made in this house. When opened under the new management it was attractively decorated with palms and ferns. A new piano has been installed, usher service is now furnished, and many things are being done to make the theater popular. As a result the business is growing in a satisfactory manner.

At Keith's theater last week it was reported that the Lauder Talking Pictures proved quite popular. This is an innovation on the Keith circuit which will be continued, at least in this city, in view of the manner in which the pictures are taking.

Attorney M. F. Mangan and Edward B. Eynon, Jr., have been appointed receivers for the Scenic theater, 1305 Wisconsin avenue, Northwest, by Justice Stafford in the District Supreme Court, with bond fixed at $2,000. Application for receivers for the business was made by Victor H. Stonesifer, who said that it had been operated under the joint management of himself and Stella Hetherington, of Fayette City, Pa., and Kate V. Bailey, of Toronto, Canada, and that recently differences have arisen that make it impossible for the joint conduct of the enterprise to continue. He suggested that the place be sold at public auction. The defendants, in an answer filed for them by Attorneys Wolf and Cohen, admitted the existence of differences of opinion as to the management and agreed to the appointment of receivers.

There has been a new development in the poster proposition in Washington in the use at Crandall's of life-sized portraits of prominent actors and actresses handsomely framed in the lobby of the theater on the days when such actors or actresses appear on the screen. This has done far more to attract attention to the show than even the most lurid of posters and these are far more in keeping with the other appointments of a first class house.

Slides are to play a prominent part in the campaign of the suffragettes and their attack upon the Democratic Party, for Miss Elsie Lancaster, a prominent member of the Congressional Union, left last week for Wyoming armed with a large number of slides which are to be shown in the moving picture houses of that State. These slides are now being used in the theaters in the State of Oregon and bear the following inscription: "Women voters—Oppose the party which blocks the suffrage amendment in Congress. Defeat the Democratic candidates for Congress."

Still another use is being made of moving pictures, it is said, in the political field by a member of Congress, who is running for re-election and who cannot find the time to get away from Washington and meet his constituents in the home town. The report has it that a cameraman followed Mr. Member of Congress around town for several days, taking him in all sorts of action to show how hard he is working in the interests of his supporters. He is to be seen in very animated conversation with several of the most prominent members of the House of Representatives, public officials and others. It is not said how these reels will fit in with the usual service, but no doubt they "can be had real cheap."

According to Harry Crandall, the downtown moving picture houses have been overlooking a good bet in the shape of matinees for women and he is starting in on a campaign to secure a good share of this business. He is including in his advertisements a "Notice to the Ladies," which reads: "Do you make it a point to attend our matinee? If not, you are missing a great pleasure. In fact, no day's shopping is complete without spending a pleasant hour at Crandall's. A good, clean, well ventilated theater, where photoplay productions of the better class are shown. Here you will find a well trained corps of employees to greet you with respect and courtesy, and every one working hard to make you feel at home, and where your presence is appreciated. Our name appears on ninety per cent. of the ladies' shopping cards; is it on yours? If not, will you kindly put it on now? Be sure to come as often as you are downtown. You will find on your first visit, by careful observation, that our matinees is very well patronized by ladies of refinement, who never miss an opportunity to attend our matinee performances. Our shows run continuously from 11 a. m. to 11 p. m. Orchestra accompanies pictures from 2 to 5 and from 7:30 to 11 p. m." In the making of the house an exclusive one, Mr. Crandall and his ushers are appearing in tuxedos and a number of improvements are being made or are in project along this line.

C. L. LINZ.

INDIANA.

THE cool nights have greatly stimulated business in Indianapolis, and there is no evidence of any kind of business depression around the picture theaters, according to Indianapolis exhibitors. Business in general is good in Indianapolis and over the state, and the picture men are getting their share of the small coins.

Manager Schromeyer of the Sourwine theater, Brazil, Ind., put on a "prettiest baby" contest. He assembled a number of mothers with babes at the corner near his theater, and had their pictures taken. The pictures were thrown on the screen at the theater—ten cents admission—and the audience decided which was the prettiest. Every baby got at least one vote, and when it was all over Manager Schromeyer blamed it all on the crowd. It is the one best way to put on a baby contest. No prizes were given. A number of pictures in the contest were of babes taken on the street and in the yards of homes.

Dale Loomis has bought a half interest in the Victoria theater, Peru, Ind., of Lincoln K. Scott, former sole proprietor. Loomis is no tyro at the picture game, having had experience both on the stage and as a moving picture actor.

B. L. Dolan has sold the Princess theater, Tipton, to Andrews & Kirkoff of Layfayette, Ind. The new owners will close the house temporarily and make a complete renovation of the interior and add a new front.

The new pipe organ at the Lyric theater, Ft. Wayne, Ind., is the biggest instrument of the kind in Ft. Wayne. It was installed by the Bennett Organ Company.

Notice has been filed with the secretary of state of the dissolution of the Etropal Amusement Company, owners of the Etropal moving picture theater, LaPorte, Ind.

The Lynn Band is conducting the Palace theater at Lynn, Ind., the musicians having taken it over at the beginning of the fall season.

The Woodlawn, Evansville, on Main street between Missouri and Oregon streets, has been opened. The house is modern and was built particularly with a view to make the patrons comfortable. The ventilation system provides for a rapid change of air, and the healthful atmosphere is one of the comforts the management is playing strong. The lighting system is the semi-direct system, which takes away the glare.

Demas Deming, proprietor of the Deming Hotel, Terre Haute, has bought the First Baptist church, across from his hotel, and will make a picture theater out of it. The church has been used by the Baptists for half a century. Mr. Deming expects to spend considerable money transforming the house of worship to a house of amusement.

Charles Risley, Petersburg, Ind., has leased a room next to the Grand Hotel, Odon, Ind., and is remodeling it for a picture house.

The Portola theater, Rushville, Ind., will be reopened by J. Elyons, formerly of Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Lyons was formerly an exhibitor at Connersville and at Knightstown, Ind.

Real, honest to goodness, policemen were necessary to hold back the crowd at the opening of Menlo E. Moore's Orpheum theater in Mitchell, Ind. Mitchell is Mr. Moore's home town. He came down from Chicago for the opening and was greatly pleased at the crowd. The theater is not the largest in the state, but money was spent freely to make it the finest possible in every other respect. The house seats 280 and the admission is ten cents

The Renfax Musical Motion Pictures were displayed to a pleased audience at the Orpheum theater in Plymouth, Ind.

The Business Men's Association gave a "Big Wednesday" in Greensburg, Ind., offering free admission to all the picture shows by arrangement. There was a staggering attendance.

John T. Whitfield and Tony Miller have leased the theater in the Gartner Building, Hammond, Ind., and have named it the College theater. It will be painted and cleaned up and will be opened by October 10.

MONTREAL.

THE ST. DENIS THEATER COMPANY, Ltd., has been incorporated with a capital of $375,000 seven per cent. cumulative preferred stock, and $375,000 common stock, of which, in each case, $350,000 is being issued. The preferred stock is being issued at par, $100, with a bonus of fifty per cent. in common stock. The site of the new theater is on the west side of St. Denis street, between St. Catherine and Ontario streets, and the theater proper will have a seating capacity of 3,800.

The theater will be under the management of Keith and Albee, who have made such a huge success of the Imperial theater on Bleury street, and who have, we are informed, subscribed for $100,000 of the St. Denis preferred stock with the fifty per cent. common stock. The new theater will, of course, be included in the Keith and Albee French circuit. The gentlemen have entered into a ten-year contract covering management and operation, in exchange for which they receive twenty-five per cent. of the outstanding common stock, presumably over and above their $100,000 subscription.

The St. Denis theater will be operated for some time as a moving picture house, though the stage will be large enough to accommodate any opera or play now on circuit. A description of this proposed theater has already been given in the Montreal column. The table of earnings estimated in the prospectus is interesting, as it no doubt reflects the fabulous revenue secured by the sister, or more properly, the parent Imperial theater. The prospectus clearly states that the estimates are based upon earnings of up-to-date theaters, "including the Imperial." The average net profit per seat per annum is shown at $80, and seventy per cent. of the 3,800 seating capacity, or 2,660 seats with full overhead charges, at an average net profit of $75 per seat gives $199,500 for a full year, less $13,000 interest on mortgage. This leaves a surplus of $162,000

Maurice West, besides managing the Family theater, will also take care of the Scala theater, also owned by the Mark-Brock Amusement Company. Mr. West announces a change of policy; moving pictures and vaudeville will now be the attractions at this handsome little house. A pipe organ is being installed, and the pictures will now be thrown on a Radium Gold Fibre Screen. The house was only recently repaired and renovated throughout.

Mr. Allan, representing the Kinemacolor Company, New York, was in town recently on business for that company. John T. Malone, manager of the local branch of the Allfeatures, Ltd., will handle Kinemacolor in this territory.

The Strand and Moulin Rouge theaters recently devoted an entire day's receipts to the National Patriotic Fund. Both houses are owned by the Independent Amusement Co., Ltd. The feature at the Strand, on the day in question, was Famous Players' "The Better Man."

October 5 and 6 were Patriotic Days at the Mount Royal theater. Mr. Herring devoted all the profits to the National Patriotic Fund. The performances were well attended, the prices, however, being raised to twenty-five and thirty-five cents. The feature was "Helping Mother," and films of Valcartier troops were shown.

A new theater will be opened soon on St. Lawrence Boulevard at Duluth avenue. It will be thoroughly modern and of handsome appearance. The fact that H. Quintus Brooks will manage the new theater should cast away all doubts as to its probable success. Mr. Brooks was recent manager of His Majesty's theater, Montreal, a Klaw & Erlanger house. Further particulars of this new enterprise will appear in a coming issue.

We dropped in the other day at the Francais to see Mr. Hooley, and were just going to ask that gentleman the cause of the supremely happy-looking smile he gave us, when a sudden burst of applause from the matinee crowd in the auditorium reached our ears, so we refrained. The crowd was cheering the heroic Belgians as depicted in the Strand War Series No. 1. We wish to compliment the genial manager for his enterprise in securing this topical. However, mention of these pictures would not be complete if reference were not made and praise given to Alexandre Silvo, the lecturer. He makes the pictures more interesting by pointing out in a bilingual talk matters of interest not clearly outlined in the subtitles. The Sunday concerts are not losing in quality or attendance.

The Globe theater will open its doors shortly. The writer's latest visit to the new building showed that work is going rapidly ahead. It promises to be an exceptionally handsome house.

Mr. Malone, of the Allfeatures, states that Kinemacolor is going strong in the Province of Quebec. Installations have just been made in Quebec, Three Rivers and Sherbrooke.

The studio at Swansea of the Conness-Till Film Company, Toronto, Ont., will be completed by the time this announcement is published. An article on this company which proposes to manufacture "Made in Canada" films will appear in a coming issue.

Quite a number of moving picture cameras were seen at the unveiling of the King Edward monument in Montreal. Incidentally, cameramen should be pretty busily occupied in Canada at the present time. The large movements of troops ought to make interesting film for the animated weeklies.

Tom Cross, manager of the Consolidated Film Company, announces that he is now handling All-Star productions in this territory.

The New Grand, after having been "dark" for some months, was reopened on Saturday, Oct. 3. The theater has been thoroughly renovated and only the best photoplays will be shown. Ten cents admission will be charged afternoons and evenings. A feature of this house is that should an elderly person buy a ticket he will be immediately ushered to a box seat without further charge. GALLAGHER.

KANSAS.

THE Fern theater at Leavenworth, Kan., has closed and the building is being remodeled for a drug store, which will move in soon.

The Aurora at Topeka, Kan., has commenced to give a continuous show from 2 p. m. until 11 p. m.; the management has found that such a system is quite satisfactory and that it boosts receipts considerably.

Two reels of films were made recently of the Kansas militia in action by Major Thomas Dickson, chaplain of the sixth field artillery. The pictures were made during a recent encampment of the militia on the Fort Riley, Kan. military reservation. The two films, which are being developed and printed by an expert photographer, will be delivered at Topeka, Kan., soon. From there the adjutant general of the National Guard at Topeka Charles T. Martin, will send them out to small towns throughout the state, where they will be exhibited, so that the people may know where the money set aside for the militia goes.

PENNSYLVANIA.

THE Alco Film Corporation leased quarters at 212 Fourth avenue last week, and are now open for business. Joseph Skirboll is the manager.

The Continental Feature Film Company of Pittsburgh reports that business conditions and the general outlook for the moving picture business for the coming fall and winter season is the greatest since the starting of that company. The management states that it is hard to determine whether this improvement in business conditions is brought about by the large legitimate features being released or to increased prosperity of the country at large.

Mayer Silverman of the Liberty Film Renting Company, Pittsburgh, is receiving a weekly topical subject entitled "Strand War Series."

Roy Gerber, formerly in charge of the film department of the George Kleine attractions, has been appointed shipping manager of the Box Office Attractions Company of Pittsburgh. He will also have full charge of the film department.

The New Garden theater on Main street, Johnstown, Pa., is another of the city's newest business buildings.

The climax of a thrilling pursuit of bank robbers for a moving picture recently in Homestead, Pa., was not what the film company had planned. The picture was to be a reproduction of the robbery of the Homestead National Bank last August 17. The two pseudo bandits, Frank Baker and Scott Whitefield, were fleeing from Constables Percy Smith and John Dixon, who were shot by the real bandits last August. While rounding a curve near the Hess farm, where the actual fight happened last August, Whitefield, who was at the wheel, ran the machine into a wagon. The automobile plunged over an embankment and was wrecked, but the occupants suffered only cuts and bruises.

The new moving picture theater being built on the site of the old Dreamland theater, Center street, Natrona, Pa., will not be known by the same name, but will be called the "Grand." The work on the new structure has been going forward rapidly and is now nearing completion, the actual building, with the exception of the huge picture screen and the fireproof operating room, is just about finished. The theater, when completed, will be one of the largest in the vicinity.

The proceeds of a most profitable film which was shown at the Star theater, Monessen, Pa., recently went to the tent fund, for the Monessen tuberculosis patients at state sanitarium. Miss Marie Watson was instrumental in securing the pictures, and T. B. Cowan deserves much credit for exhibiting them in his theater.

Lyman H. Howe's annual Travel Festival, which has been delighting and instructing Meyersdale, Pa., audiences for many years, was shown there again last week at the Donges theater.

Fully three hundred orphans from the Home for the Friendless and St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum visited the Majestic theater Thursday, September 25, as guests of the Times Publishing Company, Erie, Pa. They witnessed the production of "Cabiria."

The Ideal theater on Central avenue, Moxham, near Johnstown, Pa., is again on the active list after a shut down for repairs. William B. Glahre is lessee and George B. Glenn is the owner. It has a seating capacity of 425 and is of fireproof construction. A mirroride screen has been installed. Two machines are used. A modern ventilating system has been provided. During the winter the congregation of the Grove Avenue Methodist church will hold services in the theater.

Probably the largest audience ever assembled in the Lyceum theater, Pittsburgh, Pa., was on hand Sunday, September 27, to see the moving picture film entitled "Lay Down Your Arms." The film was exhibited under the auspices of the Socialist party of Allegheny county and will be repeated on October 11. The Socialist orchestra furnished music.

Alleged misrepresentation as to the earning power of a Braddock moving picture house led Wiliam J. Berger, of that town, to prefer charges before Alderman J. J. Kirby against W. T. Hodder, of Braddock, and Francis Mackert, of Indiana, Pa. Berger asserts that he purchased the Nickleodeon last December for $7,500. He states that the defendants represented to him that the profits were so big that each season they were able to take a trip to Florida.

Manager Dunmyer of the New Grand theater, Butler, Pa., had a narrow escape from being seriously injured, if not killed, while he was arranging a temporary light for the purpose of having a picture taken of the interior of the theater. He was stripping electric wires and, not knowing they were live, he seized both ends and was thrown with considerable force to the floor below.

The Victoria theater, Bloomsburg, Pa., recently gave a benefit play for the High School Athletic Association. The receipts for the entire evening were turned over to the association.

The Plaza theater, East Stroudsburg, Pa., is running a diamond ring contest. Ballots good for five votes is given out with every admission. The girl receiving the most votes will receive the $50 diamond.

"Cabiria," was played at the Majestic theater, Erie, Pa., for one whole week. The house was filled to the limit every show.

"Creation" was played at Roaring Spring theater, Roaring Spring, Pa., for one whole week. The promoters did not charge any admission and no collection was taken up.

The Olympic theater, one of the principle theaters on Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., has just completed installing a Kimball Organ, which promises to be one of the most notable departures for the local theater for some time past. They report exceptional business with "The Million Dollar Mystery."

The Garden theater, a new departure in the way of a high class theater for the western part of Pennsylvania, located in Johnstown, and having been financed by Mr. George Knox, is to be opened during the month of October. It is a beautiful structure with a roof garden and restaurant, and the opening day is looked for with keen anticipation.

A. Notoplos, of Altoona, Pa., is constructing one of the finest theaters in Altoona, and expects to have it finished the end of this year.

"The scenes of the herding of the French troops by the Austrians, and of the Russian troops by the Germans, in the famous Koenigsburg prisons is the most pathetic picture I ever saw," was the remark of a famous newspaper correspondent who witnessed the original exhibition of this film.

The whole reel is one of strenuous action, and ever-changing interest, portraying as it does the facts of the great death-struggle now waging between the world powers of Europe.

THE MAN IN THE DARK (Oct. 20).—Plodding along, his bag gradually filling with scraps of paper and cloth as he plied his sharp-pointed stick in cranny and nook, Silver Joe formed one of the best known characters in New York, but few realized his sorrows. In his room Joe is sorting out the day's find, when he finds a letter, the handwriting on which carried him back many years. His astonishment caused his companions to ask him what was the matter.

As if in a dream, the story came out. How he had been engaged to a beautiful girl and how, on the eve of their wedding day, he had been warned by a friend that his fiancee was to meet an unknown man. He and the friend had spied upon her and witnessed the meeting. Torn by jealousy and too proud to ask for an explanation, he had broken off his engagement and had returned, unread, a letter written by his sweetheart, Viola. At the name of Viola one of the men started forward. He disclosed the fact that he was the man whom Viola had met that night. He was her brother; the meeting with her had to be secret, as he was being pursued for a crime of which he was innocent.

Joe could hardly believe him, but the brother produced proof of his statements. Joe goes back to the house where he had picked up the letter. He was too late. Grief and sorrow had crushed the flower of his youth and she was gone. He returns to his boarding house and burns the letter which had come to him too late.

TWO'S COMPANY (Oct. 21).—Most of Charlie's time was trying to find a chance to propose to Marion, but something would happen that completely frustrated his plans. He had bought a book entitled "How to Propose." His effort to bring things to a climax when he found Marion alone was interrupted by the arrival of a friendly bore. Again, when he called on Marion he was about to speak his mind, when her grandfather entered and he was forced to entertain him. He was so deaf that he had to scream, and when his chance arrived he could hardly speak.

Marion was quite as anxious as he, so, thinking to help him the next time, she carefully placed two chairs close together. Everything looked favorable, but Peter took a hand and managed to sneak a small oil stove under Charlie's chair. Soon he was bathed in perspiration. Mopping his brow, he even got so far as to kneel, when he discovered the stove, and again all was off. They go out for a row, only to be followed by Marion's big sister and her chum. Swimming around them, they managed to upset Charlie's plans, and he rowed ashore in high dudgeon. After trying everything, even mountain climbing, where they ran into the entire family having a picnic, they finally hit upon a plan when the county fair opened and Charlie manages to get a balloon. At last they were alone, and taking one last glimpse at his trusty little book, Charlie dropped on his knees, popped the question and was accepted.

BOOTLES' BABY (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 23).—At a loss to account for the feeling, all of Gilchrist's companions felt a certain restraint when he came around. He diffused an air of gloom that was very depressing. Gilchrist's life had become embittered by an unhappy marriage, unknown to his intimates. Despite the fact that his wife and child were in want, he had thrown them both off. Grace Gilchrist made a last appeal, realizing she would have to make her way in the world. She decided to impress Gilchrist with his responsibilty by leaving the baby girl in his care. She crept into his quarters and left the sleeping child on his bed with a note saying he would have to provide for her till she could secure employment.

The unexpected sight of the child startled him, but after reading the note he decided to shift the burden to someone else, and so he placed both child and note in Bootle's room and returned downstairs to watch the result. Bootles was astonished when he discovered the child. Adjutant and Mrs. Gray arrived while he was explaining matters, and as Gilchrist had made a remark about sending the baby to an orphan asylum, Bootles sought Mrs. Gray's advice. Her motherly heart caused her to take a great fancy to the child and it was arranged that she should find a nurse for the baby.

Meantime Grace secured a position as companion with Countess Gourbolska. "Bootle's Baby" became the talk of the garrison and Bootles came in for a bit of gossip, while Gilchrist fanned the flame. Countess Gourbolska was invited to a house party, and as Grace accompanied her she was suddenly confronted with her own child. Her emotion was very evident, and Gilchrist smiled sardonically as he watched Bootles assist her into the house. Bootles became interested in Grace, which was noticed by Gilchrist, and when she made another appeal to him he taunted her with Bootles' attentions.

Matters were in this state and Bootles had even proposed to Grace, when the day of the regimental race arrived. Gilchrist's horse made an awful fall and before anything could be done the young officer expired. Later Grace decided to send for her baby. When Bootles brought the child to the hotel he was greeted with a surprise, finding out Grace's real identity. Bootles renewed his suit, and was made happy by Grace's blushing assent never to separate Bootles from his baby.

BUSTER BROWN'S UNCLE (Oct. 24).—Buster was highly elated over the announcement of his uncle's early visit and began to scheme ways and means to derive fun out of the event. Uncle Buster arrived, tired out, and begged to be excused from meeting the guests who were to arrive that evening. He had been installed in the library for an after-dinner cigar, and had fallen asleep. Then Buster, Mary Jane and Tige found him. Like a flash, Buster had a scheme. As the old gentleman slept, he and Mary Jane fastened a pair of skates on his feet. Then both of the little scamps united their voices in cries of "Fire! Fire!"

Springing to his feet, Uncle Buster proceeded to perform a number of rather complicated contortions, must to the children's delight, and Mr. and Mrs. Brown rushed in to ascertain the cause of the uproar. The children were packed off to bed and Uncle Buster released. Buster conceived another plan to scare his uncle. Sending Mary Jane for the alarm clock, he set it, together with that of the nursery, and the two children, accompanied by Tige, crept into the guest's room and slipped the two clocks under uncle's pillow. Meantime the guests had arrived and Mr. and Mrs. Brown were busy entertaining them when suddenly they heard an awful row, and Uncle Buster, clad in pajamas, rushed into their very midst, followed by the conspirators. Pandemonium reigned for a moment. Uncle Buster beat a hasty retreat. Buster was saved from a well-merited spanking by the intercession of the guests and made another of his unique resolutions.

A QUESTION OF CLOTHES (Oct. 24).—Weary Logan dropped into town the very day that a general tramp hunt was organized by Henry Harvey, the local magnate. Catching sight of Weary Logan having a tussle with a dog, Harvey telephoned the police and extra impetus was given to the hunt. Feeling a bit seedy, Harvey decided to go out into the country for a while, so he phoned his wife and started off.

As luck would have it, Weary Logan spied Harvey taking a swim in the lake. Taking the banker's clothes, he proceeded to put them on, leaving his own in their place. Harvey caught sight of him and yelled, but Logan gave him the laugh and started for the village. In the tramp's clothes, Harvey returned to the village, but on his way he tasted a bit of the world's attitude toward tramps and a change came over him. Weary met the other side of the question and in his changed appearance found employment formerly refused him.

Harvey soon reached the village and was arrested by the very police he urged on in their tramp hunt. The local paper got the story and made much of it. In this way Weary Logan learned of Harvey's identity. He wrapped up the clothes he had taken and called at the house to deliver them. Harvey's experience had given him a different outlook on life and when explanations were over the two men shook hands and were friends.

IN THE OPEN (Oct. 21).—In a covered wagon drawn by two scrawny horses, Sancho Mendez, a Mexican, makes camp near a settler's homestead. With him is his step-daughter, Conchita, whom he mistreats. Ben Carroll, the homesteader, lives alone with his mother, who is ill. She suffers a slight relapse and Ben goes for a doctor. On the way he protects Conchita from her step-father's brutality and knocks him down. Learning the girl's story, and sorry for her, Ben takes her to his shack and leaves her in care of his mother. He then resumes his journey, after stopping long enough to warn Mendez not to molest her. Meanwhile, the sick woman, slightly recovering, shows Conchita some old keepsakes, including some valuable jewelry. Mendez, lurking about, peers through the window. Forcing his way into the shack with a revolver, he takes possession of the jewelry and compels Conchita to return with him. He prepares for a hasty departure. Suddenly Conchita sees Ben and the doctor and attempts to attract their attention. As she does so, Mendez sees her and threatens to shoot the men if she makes an outcry. He then forces her into the wagon while Ben and the doctor ride on.

Crouched in the wagon, Conchita sobs heartbrokenly. An idea occurs to her. As Mendez busies himself for departure Conchita sets fire to the wagon cover. As the flames leap up, the Mexican drags her from the wagon, where she falls in a swoon. Ben and the doctor, attracted by the flames, arrive on the scene and are told the facts by Conchita, who has quickly recovered consciousness. Mendez is disarmed and the jewelry recovered. The sheriff, attracted by the burning wagon, appears and takes the Mexican into custody. Realizing in a flash that he loves the girl, Ben takes Conchita back to his mother, who welcomes her tenderly.

THE FINAL IMPULSE (Oct. 23).—Jack, the foreman's assistant, loves Marian, the foreman's daughter. Nothing exciting ever happens in the out-of-the-way construction camp. He is warned by an old blacksmith in the camp that something may happen any time. Later a stranger arrives in the camp and wins the attention of Marian. The stranger seems to care for no one but the little child of the blacksmith, and seems to be a man of mystery. One day a girl arrives whom the stranger has deserted. She is shot when she tries to kill him to avenge a wrong. A posse led by Jack starts after the stranger and leads through various parts of the camp. The stranger is cornered at one end of the trestle on the electric construction railroad. Here he starts an electric engine across as his pursuers are after him. They are about to be swept off to the rocks below. Just then the blacksmith's child, who has been hiding on the work train, cries out. The stranger sees her going to her death. As the only way to stop the engine he pulls down the trolley wire, stopping the engine, but resulting in his own death.

THE BLUE FLAME (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 19).—Edward Collins is the head of the "Crime Syndicate." He is an attractive and clever rascal. He happens in front of the post-office when Etta Garvey turns her ankle while stepping from her limousine, and seizing the opportunity, intrudes his acquaintance upon her. He gives her his card as "Edward Collins, Broker," and notes the number of her automobile, which he identifies later as belonging to George Garvey, a wealthy and influential jeweler.

Etta returns home and relates the incident. She has been impressed by the appearance of Collins and persuades her mother to call him on the telephone and thank him for his courtesy to her daughter. Collins cleverly follows this up and soon becomes a stanch friend of the family.

Harry Garvey, the wayward son and junior member of the firm, has met through an intrigue of Collins, a beautiful, auburn-haired confederate of the thieves, named Georgia Wells. His conduct with her is becoming notorious and embarrasses his family, especially his sister, Etta. Collins determines to pull off a robbery and manages to introduce Nell Wade into the Garvey home as a maid. Her father, "Buck" Wade, is a hoary-headed old rascal, who was implicated in the so-called "Marshall mystery," in which a murder was committed. Nell is compelled to participate in the criminal acts of the "Crime Syndicate" by threats on the part of Collins that he will expose her father to a term in the penitentiary unless she consents. Nell loves her father and to save him from jail enters into the plot. Nell falls in love with Harry and her heart is loyal, notwithstanding his escapades with Georgia Wells.

A big shipment of diamonds is announced at the dinner table, and Nell transmits this information to Collins through a private box in the post-office. In the meantime, Collins proposes to Etta and is accepted as her fiance. A brilliant ball is then arranged in honor of their engagement. Through the cleverness of Collins, the date of the ball is set upon the day when the shipment of diamonds is to arrive. The plot for stealing the diamonds is concocted at a meeting in Collins' office. Each one of the confederates is supplied with an electric pocket light in which has been placed a special blue lens, so that a blue flame will be thrown by the lamp and the conspirators can distinguish each other in this way in the darkness.

The diamonds are duly delivered by a special messenger, who is escorted by two detectives. Unknown to them, they are shadowed by Dick Little, secret service operative. The diamonds are placed in the safe in the store, and "Buck" Wade, who is watching from the window across the street, signals the news. Dick Little notes the flash of the signal and proceeds to investigate. George Garvey places the wallet containing the diamonds in his inside vest pocket and goes home, accompanied by Harry. They are followed by one of the conspirators, who is shadowed by Dick Little. That night, Nell carefully watches George Garvey in order to ascertain what disposition he makes of the wallet containing the diamonds.

Among the guests at the ball is Dick Little, secret service man, uninvited, yet unnoticed. The crime confederates secretly enter the house and upon a signal the lights in the ballroom go out. There are three different flashes with blue flames, a pistol shot, and when the lights are turned on again George Garvey stands astounded, vest open and wallet gone. Lying on the floor at Etta's feet is Collins, dead, with a bullet in his heart and a pistol at his side.

The police arrive and proceed to make an investigation. The escapades and dissolute habits of Harry cause him to be subjected to a thorough questioning by the police. Nell is questioned, together with the other members of the household, but no suspicion is attached to her. Special detectives are called in and they discover a flashlight with a blue lens in the alley. Georgia Wells has disappeared, and the police can find no trace of her. They have christened the Garvey diamond robbery "The Blue Flame."

Dick Little has been on the job from the beginning. He has traced the purchasing place of the electric pocket lights and found out about the change of the regular lens to the blue lens. A photograph of Collins has been identified as that of the man who purchased the electric pocket lights Step by step the investigation proceeds and Georgia Wells and the other confederates are traced until located in a Western city. They write to Nell Wade, accusing her and "Buck Wade," her father, with a misappropriation of the diamonds. The diamonds have disappeared, and it is evident to the investigators that neither of the thieves has them in his possession. Suspicion falls upon Nell Wade through the interception of letters sent her by the other members of the gang.

Nell is prevailed upon by Dick Little, who promises to shield her if she will tell the truth, to give the facts in connection with the robbery so far as she knows them. She states that somebody handed her the wallet containing the diamonds, which she passed on to another party, which she was sure was Collins. In flashing the blue flame from her lamp in Collins' face, she noticed that he had his revolver pointed at Harry Garvey, and was about to shoot. She seized his arm, struggled with him a moment and diverted the bullet. Dick Little throws off his disguise as the butler, and introduces himself as a secret service operative. He explains how he had shadowed the conspirators to the house, entered the ballroom and when Nell passed the wallet to Collins he intercepted it. The whole mystery is then explained. In the dim corner of the room Nell and Harry exchange love pledges, while the moonlight beams silhouette their profiles in a shining blue flame.

JIMMY HAYES AND MURIEL (Oct. 20).—Jimmy Hayes joins the Texas rangers. He causes much merriment by introducing to his new friends an ugly horned toad, around the neck of which he has tied a bright ribbon. He has named the horned toad "Muriel," and it is his constant companion, having a domicile within his flannel shirt. Saldar, a Mexican bandit, creates a reign of terror among the settlers, and the Texas rangers go in pursuit. Saldar attacks the camp and Jimmy Hayes rides out to meet the bandits unseen by his companions, who think he has deserted them.

Jimmy has a running fight in which he kills Saldar and other members of the band, and is himself killed. The rangers have reported with regret that Jimmy Hayes deserted. A year later, while riding past the scene, the rangers find the skeletons. From the whitened bones of one, an ugly horned toad, wearing a faded bit of ribbon, crawls to meet the visitors. Jimmy Hayes is vindicated.

THE RAJAH'S VACATION (Oct. 21).—Hennessy and Morris, rival sporting editors, are mutual victims of Dame Fortune. They are broke and "up against it," when Hobart, the advance agent of the circus, writes them to handle the newspaper notices and bill posting, and they will receive $50,000 for their work. Hobart has broken his leg. Joyfully they carry out his instructions and, when the circus comes to town, they demand their money of the proprietor. He gives them the laugh, and Hobart then advises them to attach "Rajah," the elephant, if the showman will not pay them. The sheriff attaches "Rajah," whose appetite causes consternation. He eats all the hay in town. Then they hire him to a department store for advertising purposes, obtain enough money to pay their bills, and finally the owner presents himself and relieves them of "Rajah."

A TONSORIAL LEOPARD TAMER (Oct 23).—Mose Jackson runs the colored barber shop. He is enamored of Lucinda Snow, a domestic in the household of George Marston, a retired animal hunter. Lucinda is fickle, and is distracted by the glittering uniform of Gallus Brown, a pullman car porter. Mose attends the circus to see Signor Leonardo exhibit his cage of performing leopards, and Mose is hypnotized by the brilliant, gold-braided coat worn by the Signor. He determines to abstract the coat.

Leonardo buys some catnip for his big, spotted pets and places it in the tail pockets of his uniform coat. Mose steals the coat and puts it on. Just as he is leaving the enclosure, two of the leopards escape from their cage and, scenting the fragrant catnip, start in pursuit. Mose thinks they want to eat him and rushes frantically up the street. The situation is saved by a fortunate meeting with the Signor.

THE TRAGEDY THAT LIVED (Oct. 24).—John and Mary are lovers in the year 1860. Mary flirts with a scoundrel, named Starling, and John discovers them playing with fire. He slaps Starling's cheek with his glove, rendering the scoundrel frenzied with venegeance. Mary pleads, but John says: "If you are false to me now, you will be false to me afterwards."

That night, Mary, filled with misgivings and heart broken, walks into the family portrait gallery and falls asleep in a big chair. She dreams that two of the portraits, a man and a woman, come to life, and re-enact a tragedy of one hundred years ago, which started in the same way as Mary's flirtation with Starling. The fatal duel scene of a hundred years ago is re-enacted. Then she awakens filled with dread and endeavors to find John. A servant hands her a note left by John, indicating an imminent duel. She hears two shots fired where the fatal duel occurred a century before. The tragedy that lived is born again.

"SHE LANDED A BIG ONE" (Oct. 19).—Sweedie tells her beau that her love has grown cold, so he decides to jump in the lake and end it all. He is prevented from taking this awful step by a stranger in the city, who goes to the buxom Sweedie, after making the rescue, and tries to make himself a hero in her eyes. He fails to show his bravery, however, in rescuing Sweedie some time later, when she has hooked a big fish and is being dragged out in the lake. He calls the police and a chase in the motor boat ensues, in which they catch up to Sweedie and assist her in pulling in her large catch. The hook breaks and the monstrous fish gets away. Angry at their interference, Sweedie dumps them all in the lake and sallies forth to again try her luck.

"MOTHER O' DREAMS" (Oct 20).—Sloan, being out of work, goes west to find employment, leaving his wife behind. A baby is born, and shortly after Mrs. Sloan is sent to a hospital, having contracted a contagious disease. From that time on he tried in every possible way to learn her name and address, but nary a soul did he know who could arrange an introduction. He worried himself sick, and his doctor ordered him away to a summer resort. Still she was constantly on his mind. One day she blew in at the summer hotel, and after two years of waiting he met her. That was plenty, her line of gab queered her from the start. Next day Mr. Cooley beat it for home. Moral: Many who look the limit do not listen very well.

"SLIPPERY SLIM, THE MORTGAGE AND SOPHIE" (Oct. 22). Slippery Slim, the Justice of Peace, serves a notice on Hiram Clutts, threatening to foreclose his mortgage unless Sophie marries him the next day. Hiram agrees that Sophie shall marry him as he demands. Sophie tells Mustang of this and they plan to elope that night. Mustang calls for her in his buggy, but they fail to make their escape unnoticed by Hiram. He chases them with a shotgun, but is unable to catch them before they reach Slim's office. They disguise themselves and Slim, not knowing who they are, performs the marriage ceremony. They then take off their disguises and Slim falls into a faint at seeing his disastrous mistake.

"BRONCHO BILLY—FAVORITE" (Oct. 24).—Having refused to accompany either Broncho Billy or the mail carrier to a dance at the town hall, Broncho's sweethearts accepts the invitation of his best pal. Broncho takes the defeat gracefully and decides to leave the country, while the mail carrier tries to force her to go with him. She pulls a gun on him. He snatches it away from her, then leaves a note telling that he will turn the "plaything" over to her sweetheart if he calls for it at the saloon. Her sweetheart is afraid to do this, but tells Broncho of the affair and he immediately goes to the saloon, where he overpowers the mail carrier, taking the gun away from him. He then departs. The girl upon hearing who really recovered the gun, starts in pursuit of Broncho, overtakes him and induces him to return.

"THE PRIVATE OFFICER" (Special—Two Parts Oct. 23).—Harry Lampton and Lieutenant Frothingham are rivals for the hand of Muriel March, a beautiful society girl. Muriel is fascinated with the dashing army officer. Lampton discovers him to be a mercenary fortune-hunter and denounces him in the officers' club room at Fort Barton. Seeking out Muriel he exposes Frothingham. Muriel defends the army officer, who enters at this moment. Turning to him, Muriel declares that she will marry him gladly, and Lampton stumbles from the room, a broken man. He gives up his work, resigns from his club, and finally, in a fit of despondency, joins the U. S. Army.

Having successfully passed his examinations, Lampton is horrified to find that he has been assigned to the Ninth Infantry, stationed at Fort Barton. Here he finds himself under his successful rival, Frothingham. He is reprimanded at guard-mounting by the insolent lieutenant, who takes delight in humiliating him before the troop. Time passes and Frothingham is in the city on leave of absence. A report spreads through the fort that the lieutenant is on a debauch, and that if he fails to return for guard-mounting, he will be disgraced. Lampton wires Muriel and learns that Frothingham supposedly left her for the fort two days before. Realizing the marked resemblance between him and the lieutenant, Lampton determines upon a desperate ruse to save Muriel from Frothingham's disgrace. Going to the lieutenant's quarters that night, Lampton shaves off his mustache and dressed in Frothingham's uniform, determined to take his place at guard-mounting next morning. He is discovered by Captain Osborne, who on hearing his story agrees to help him. The ruse is successful and Lampton masquerades splendidly. Frothingham returns at noon, much the worse for his debauch, and the truth comes out when Muriel arrives in time to discover his true nature. Lampton is congratulated by his Colonel. Frothingham is placed under arrest with the knowledge that his engagement to Muriel is broken, and the heartbroken girl finds true love and happiness in the arms of Lampton.

creditors harassing him for money, and his ancient family seat about to be sold under a mortgage foreclosure. With a hazy idea of quickly making a fortune, he goes West. He arrives in the midst of a stampede for a new and amazingly rich gold field, but is too ill to try his luck. He is absolutely broke, and when the landlord of the primitive hotel demands money, he can offer nothing but the stock in the "Golden Hope." This the landlord scornfully refuses.

Betty, who is staying at the hotel, and who never ceased to think of Cecil, though with bitter shame for the part she played in his despoilment, learns that the "Golden Hope" is the choicest claim in the new gold field, worth at least a million dollars, and succeeds in warning Cecil just in time to prevent him from giving his stock to the landlord, who has also learned the value of the stock and his mistake in having refused to take it in settlement of his bill. Carson, hearing of the great strike, hurries to the place, hoping that he will be able to again acquire possession of the Golden Hope stock. Discovering that Cecil has been informed of its value, he plots with the landlord to rob him of it, but Betty learns their plans and warns Cecil, also providing him with a revolver. Cecil is an easy victor in the encounter which follows. Betty, still burning with shame for her part in the original swindling of Cecil, is unable to face him, and he leaves for England without seeing her again, being forced to hurry in order to save his estates. She does not know, as she stands, a forlorn and wistful little figure, that he is carrying her picture in his heart.

SUCH A MESS (Oct. 20).—Dan Hodge and Jim Podge are sworn enemies, which is no reason at all why Jack Hodge and Bess Podge should not fall in love with each other. They do and old Hodge and Podge are furious. Jack gets sore and declares that he will marry Bess within three days or give up all hope of marrying her. Hodge and Podge know he means it and they do their best to prevent it.

Jack writes Bess to meet him. Old Podge gets the note and not only locks Bess in her room but nails the door. His romantic sister promises to meet Jack and explain, but Podge tells Hodge and they seize Jack and bind him in a chair. Hodges' brother, Bill, from Texas, comes and offers to help out by taking Jack's place and carrying the girl so far out of town she cannot get married that night. Hodge, not knowing about Auntie, thinks it's a fine scheme and the plan is carried out. Podge sees the elopement and thinks that Jack has escaped. He runs home and finds it was Auntie that eloped so he lets Bess out.

Meantime Hodge turns Jack loose, supposing that Bill has captured Bess. Bill, in the auto with Auntie, meets a breakdown and a sheriff at the same time. Auntie appeals to the man with the star and Bill learns that unless it's an elopement it's an abduction punishable by life imprisonment. He almost decides in favor of imprisonment but wisely changes his mind, and the two pairs of newly weds come to Hodge to confess.

ONLY SKIN DEEP (Oct. 20).—Bess and Rose, two sisters, are envious of a chum's engagement ring and when they see a matrimonial advertisement, they decide to answer it even though the advertisement emphatically reads that only homely women need apply since the advertiser has already lost three pretty wives. With the aid of hairdressing and make up, they contrive to qualify for the position of a homely wife and when Bess is eliminated she knocks out a few front teeth and tries again. This nearly snatches the victory from Rose; but Bess is finally outdone by an older and much homelier woman who captures the "beauty" prize, and the girls are glad their beauty is only skin deep.

THE HOPELESS GAME (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 21).—Herbert Murry, a broker's clerk, who has been dabbling in stocks, receives a letter from Mabel Bordon, a friend, who is returning from abroad. He plans a marriage with the wealthy girl. While on the ship, Mabel meets Jack Thorp. Love wakens quickly on the ocean and the two find themselves engaged. On the last night of the voyage, Jack becomes involved in an altercation over a game of cards and Mabel is heartbroken when the man she loves is denounced by one of the officers of the liner as being a steamship gambler. Jack honestly loves Mabel and writes her that he is going away, but will return to her when he can do so with an honest name.

In the West, Jack endeavors to find work, but is finally forced to take up card playing again. Luck is with him, and with large winnings from the gambling house, he plays a final hand with the proprietor in which the latter stakes the establishment against Jack's winnings. Jack holds the higher cards and finds himself owner of the place. In the East, Mabel is courted by Murry, but remains true to her love for Jack. In a brawl in Jack's gambling hall, Grimes, a habitue of the place, is killed, and Jack is awakened to a realization of the truth when he sees the anguish of the widow, and when she accuses him of being the cause of her husband's death. He determines to quit the game, closes the hall, and gives the money it has made him to the widow. Then he takes work as stableman on a ranch.

Mabel's father dies, and Murry renews his attentions to the heiress. In a Western paper, he sees an account of the murder in Jack's establishment. Though he has never seen Jack he knows that Mabel loves a man by that name, and he sends Mabel a copy of the paper. When she learns of Jack's broken promise, and that he is the proprietor of the gambling hall, she yields to Murry's entreaties. They are married. Two years later Murry has dissipated Mabel's fortune. He has himself become a gambler and has appropriated money from his employers. Jack, whose intelligence has made him a partner in the ranch, finds an opportunity to go East. He calls on Mabel and finds her married. She is distracted over the discovery of Murry's dishonesty, and tells Jack of his defalcation. He has not enough money to make good Murry's thefts, but determined to play one game in an effort to win the necessary amount. He goes to a gambling house where he plays with indifferent luck. Finally Jack wins. The other leaves the game in consternation. The next morning Jack takes the money to Mabel. She is filled with gratitude. She bids him farewell, and starts for the den to find Murry. She opens the door, and starts back in horror. Jack rushes to her. Murry, a suicide, lies dead. Jack looks into his face. It is the man who lost to him in the poker game.

HER MOTHER WAS A LADY (Special—Two Parts Oct. 22).—Bob Jennings, a young business man, has for a mother a social climber. She wishes Bob to marry Janet, a young society woman. But Bob does not care for Janet, although the latter is attracted, thinking him a man of wealth. Bob daily meets Nan O'Hara, a waitress at a railway lunch-counter. Nan is an orphan, whose mother "was a lady" despite Nan's lowly position. One day Bob leaves a packet of important business letters on the lunch counter after finishing his usual meal. Nan finds the papers. She realizes their importance to Bob, reads his office address on the papers, and hurries to restore them. She does this in time to save Bob from losing an important contract. Nan is dismissed by the lunch-counter manager for leaving her post of duty.

Bob finds her out of work and offers her a home in his own house, as a companion to his mother. Nan agrees much to the anger of "Butch" Hardy, a rough character whose love for her is not reciprocated. Soon after Nan is established in Bob's home, the mother begins to realize that Nan and Bob are in love. Their marriage would be fatal to her contemplated scheme. She resolves to end the love match. About this time "Butch" and some rough companions burglarize Bob's home. Bob is desperately wounded in his fight with the housebreakers and Nan nurses him back to health. Bob's affection for Nan increases and Mrs. Jennings determines to have Nan leave the house.

The chance soon offers itself. Bob is called out of town. Mrs. Jennings shows Nan a notice in the paper; it is to the effect that Bob and Janet are engaged. Brokenhearted, Nan is prevailed upon to leave. When Bob returns and learns of his mother's action, he is incensed. Hurriedly he searches for Nan; he finds her back at her old post in the lunch-room. Meanwhile his mother has manager to have a reception at her home at which the engagement of Bob and Janet is to be announced. Bob realizes that unless he proposes at once to Nan he will have to marry Janet. As he greets Nan at the lunch-counter, the big noontime rush starts. Bob decides to help out Nan in her effort to wait upon all of the passengers. After the rush subsides, Bob, determined not to lose a moment, proposes to Nan. Before the astonished lunch-counter patrons can realize what has happened, a minister who has been eating at the counter has joined Bob and Nan in marriage. Finally before the sparkling array of the elite there appears Bob, leading through the crowd of society folks a bashful, smiling little Irish girl. Later Mrs. Jennings forgives the newly-weds and Nan comes to Bob's home to stay.

Something New and Novel At Last

Grab Your Territory Quick

The latest creations of the most celebrated song writers of the world in motion pictures.

Produced by the well known motion picture directors with a cast of high salaried artists.

Every picture is composed of a prelude introducing the composer in a dramatic or comic interpolation of how the song was inspired and how written, then with a proper cue, the story of the song itself continues on the film to the accompaniment of a singer. (Don't worry about the singer—if the house you book has no regular one, we will tell you how to get them.)

Ever since the first trial showing of one of our subjects, "The Fatherland, the Motherland, The Land of My Best Girl"—by Macdonald & Carroll (writers of "Trail of the Lonesome Pine") at Hammerstein's, N. Y., we have been deluged with requests from managers, booking agents and picture houses to arrange dates—but in order to properly and systematically distribute the greatest novelty on the stage, we have turned them all down. This is an attraction that can be booked solid in every vaudeville house and then over again in moving picture houses.

Sure Fire Motion Picture Novelty---Will Clean Up For You

We want a live wire high class states right buyer in your territory to book dramas and comedies which will be produced around the latest popular song hits—written and to be written by the leading song writers.

All the good songs are controlled by us and the best writers of songs are writing for us all the time.

The production of these motion picture songs will be the best money can buy and ingenuity turn out. They will tear the house down with applause—that's why we want to sell restricted territory—so our production will receive proper distribution and showing.

The Right Price to the Right Man

We will issue two releases weekly—The most popular hits by popular writers only —films will run 800 to 1000 feet.

VICTOR.

THE BRIDE OF MARBLEHEAD (Two Parts—Oct. 25).—Nancy lived her life near the sea and she knew it as a companion. Nancy's sweetheart Nathan was a fisherman. He was a manly sort of a fellow and to him the sea held charms greater than anything, aside from his sweetheart. It was a raw morning that Nancy bid her lover farewell. Nathan set sail for one of the customary fishing trips which were to last several days. Nancy told him that she would leave her lamp burning in the window every night as a beacon for him—that she would continue to hope for his safe return. Nathan had run many dangers, but it was on this trip that he first met the water in a death struggle. His boat was struck by lightning and sunk. Flud Irson, an old enemy of Nathan's, was sailing near and observed the man's threatening condition, but coward that he was, he sailed away without giving aid. Jasper, another fisherman, came to Nathan's rescue and succeeded in bringing him safely to shore. Here the two men were met by Nancy, who was waiting during the storm fearful of her sweetheart's safety. Nathan explains the loss of his boat and thanks Jasper for his brave act of rescue.

The meeting between the two young lovers has its effect upon the older man. A short time after as a result of this, Jasper makes Nathan the captain of his boat, and Nathan soon sails away again. The crew of Nathan's ship is angered because of a strict discipline and jealous of his sudden rise, mutinies after they were out several days. Following a desperate fight, Nathan is overpowered and thrown into the sea. Returning back, the crew arrives at the fishing village to inform Jasper and Nancy that Nathan had been accidentally drowned. Nancy is prostrated with grief, while Jasper, who has begun to experience hopes of winning Nancy's favor, is rather glad because of it.

A year elapses. Jasper has forced his suit with Nancy relentlessly. Nancy still harbors memories of Nathan, but she finally consents to marry the man who once rescued him. The date is set. Jasper, walking along the shore one day, suddenly catches sight of a ragged and unkempt figure, whom he recognizes as Nathan. Nathan approaches, greets his old friend, who at such a turn in events, has turned enemy, and relates the remarkable circumstances of his escape from the sea. Jasper listens all the time, questioning the effect upon Nancy when she meets her old lover. In his heart he decides that this meeting must never be; that Nathan must be out of the way if he hopes to bring success to his own suit. Instructing Nathan to sit on the rocks so that he, Jasper, can prepare her for the shock of surprise, Jasper hurries away. He has evolved his plan by the time he meets Nancy. His heart turned to stone, he tells Nancy that he has found the man who murdered her lover a year before. Nancy is filled with a desire for revenge. Memories of her old sweetheart surge up and she determines to kill his murderer. A meeting is arranged for that night. Jasper has picked the spot where the darkness would not be apt to disclose the identity of Nathan, and it is in the dark that Nancy strikes down her own lover, thinking him the while the murderer of her sweetheart. When she discovers her mistake, her mind becomes temporarily unbalanced. Her eyes turn towards the man whose lying lips were responsible for the awful mistake. She approaches him and the smile that crosses her lips is one of murderous contempt. Jasper backs away and Nancy bearing down upon him closer and closer, finally forces him over the edge of the cliff to find death in the sea below.

ECLAIR.

THE LINE RIDER (Two Parts—Oct. 7).—Mr. Richardson entrusts the management of his ranch to "Cree Charlie," a friend of Paul Labelle, a cattle rustler. The foreman's stepdaughter, Ciel, despises Paul, who seeks her hand in marriage. There is a treacherous stretch of ground known as Hell's Hole; no living thing had ever been known to escape once the Hole had been entered.

Paul arrives with some "rustled" cattle. Charlie and a half-breed quickly change the brand to that of Richardson. The division superintendent of the Royal Northwest Mounted Polie are notified that cattle are being stolen. Sergeant Rae, a handsome young ranger, is put on the case with instructions to watch Labelle. Disguised as a tenderfoot, Rae secures a position with Charlie.

Shortly after, the sergeant and Ciel fall in love. Rae keeps his identity a secret. The lovers agree upon the curfew's mournful call as their signal. Meantime, another large consignment of "rustled" cattle arrives and Charlies instructs Rae to change the brand. It is the opportune moment; Rae discloses his identity and arrests the foreman. He starts, with the captive foreman, to the station. They are met on the road by Paul. He manages to capture Rae. A plot is made to throw Rae into Hell's Hole and organize a searching party. On their way, Charlie's stepdaughter overhears them discussing their plans; she rushes to where Rae is held, bound to a tree.

Just as Ciel is about to free her lover Paul appears. Insane with jealousy, he is about to shoot the sergeant when Ciel convinces him that she had been tying the prisoner more securely in order to prevent his escape; she asserts that the love scene he witnessed was simply to trick Rae. She departs with Paul, leaving Rae in a state of torment. That evening she promises Paul to attend a dance with him. While dressing, Ciel hears the howl of a wolf. Realizing what it means, she seizes a horse and dashes to her lover's rescue. She is just in time to prevent the wolves devouring him. As it is, she is forced, after the rescue, to take refuge in a tree. Rae goes for help.

Meanwhile Paul and Charlie discover her flight and the rescue of the sergeant. After hours of search they find Ciel, who has fallen from the tree, unconscious upon the ground. Paul, drunk and furious at being betrayed, is about to brand her with the iron used on the cattle. Rae, with assistance, appears in time to prevent this. The two thieves are apprehended and thrown into prison to pay for their misdeeds. Ciel and Rae continue in their romance of love uninterrupted.

SMALLPOX ON THE CIRCLE U (Oct. 25.).—When Jean Marlow, an eastern girl, arrives at the ranch, all the cowboys promptly fall in love, but more especially Texas Bill, the foreman. Jean seems to care less for Bill's company than for the company of any of the others. It aggravates Bill greatly. Bill, immediately after a snubbing from Jean, chances to meet Dr. Kent, a young practitioner, on the trail. Bill indulges in an inspiration. He outlines a hurriedly formulated plan to the doctor, and after some bribing, explaining and coaxing, secures the doctor's consent to assist him.

Bill hurries back to the ranch, buys the assistance of Won Lung, the Chink cook, and proceeds to decorate said Chink's physiognomy with the cork from the red ink bottle. Won Lung is discovered by the cowpunchers and his face, together with his contortions, cause alarm. Dr. Kent's verdict is "smallpox." The boys are all quarantined (except Bill) in the mess house. Dr. Kent meets Jean as he is leaving the ranch, and the meeting is one of surprise—they are old sweethearts parted through some slight quarrel. They become friends again. Bill dresses himself in his finest, hunts up Jean, and laughingly tells her of the Chink's illness and the quarantine of the punchers. She reproves him for his merriment and signifies her determination to go to the mess house and nurse the Chinaman. This is beyond Bill's calculations.

Bill feigns sickness himself, sends for the doctor, also for the nurse. She comes and he feels better. The doctor comes, sees the state of affairs, and vaccinates him. Meanwhile with the pretty nurse gone, the cowboys abuse Won Lung, who becomes peeved and tells them how they have been duped. They prepare for Bill. Jean and the doctor have been enjoying a private conversation. Bill sees the doctor kiss Jean. He rises in his wrath; explanations follow, the doctor announces his engagement just as the cowboys who have broken quarantine arrive. The cowboys drag Bill from bed and tie a noose around his neck.

He swears everlasting vengeance on father.

The next day father gets the toothache. When he can stand it no longer, he decides to go to a dentist and have the tooth pulled. The first sign he reads says: John Carter, Dentist. Father goes on to the next sign. As it happens, that dentist is a chum of John Carter's and has just called up John requesting him to come over for a consultation. John is in the back room when father enters. Father says he wants his tooth pulled. John puts his friend wise and for some reason, unknown to the father, the friend decides the tooth must not be pulled. John comes to father's assistance and relieves him of the sour spot, after securely strapping him in the chair to give him the necessary gas. Father wakes up just in time to find John is starting in on the rest of his teeth. At father's ejaculations at not wanting to lose the rest, John tells him it's either his teeth or his daughter. Father decides he needs the teeth the worst.

THE NIHILISTS (Oct. 30).—Thomas Madison, prosecuting attorney, has been warned several times that the city was infested with a desperate gang of Russians who teach Nihilism. He determines to crush this spirit. The daily paper publishes this fact. He becomes a marked man for the bomb throwers as the result.

His brother, Frederick, a young architect, while superintending the construction of a large building, breaks his arm and is taken to a doctor for treatment. This physician is a prominent Nihilist. Later the gang decide who will carry out the decision of their council. The lot falls to Zene, the stepdaughter of Dr. Petrosky. When the day is close at hand Alexoff, one of the band, takes her to the court house to point out their victim. As the attorney comes down the steps, she is nearly overcome because of his striking resemblance to the young architect, whom she has learned to love. Zene meets her lover soon after, and from him learns that the prosecuting attorney is his brother.

On the day set for the killing of the attorney Zene breaks with the gang and goes to Thomas Madison and warns him. With detectives they hasten to her home to arrest her stepfather. In the meantime Dr. Petrosky has finished the infernal machine, and is explaining it to Nickolas Alexoff. Accidentally, he turns over a vial containing some of the poisonous fluid. The fumes asphyxiate both the physician and Alexoff. On the arrival of Zene and the attorney they find the stepfather and Alexoff dead, victims of their own machinations.

He shuts and locks it. Meantime the other wagon has floated out to sea; the bather, on top, yells for help. Looie runs to save her, but her real sweetheart comes along and makes the rescue. mond ring and informs Alice of her engagement. Later, Alice decides, against her sister's advice, to go to work in the canning factory to provide herself with a suitable wedding trousseau.

In the factory Alice meets Duncan Bronson, manager of a department. Bronson, who bears an unsavory reputation, is attracted to Alice and succeeds in winning her approval. Annie looks on with troubled eyes. She gives Alice a bit of sisterly advice, but the younger girl refuses to give heed. Annie seeks out the manager, but is only laughed at for her pains. She suddenly blooms forth prettily adorned with dresses purchased with money she had laboriously saved. The manager discovers that Annie has charms far superior to those of her flighty sister, Alice, and it is to Annie that he turns his attentions.

After Alice is married to young Swaine—the danger past, Annie returns to her plain dress and tightly combed hair. She is suspected and gossipped about, and even her own sister refuses her the consolation of a good deed done. In the little village, Annie continues her work in the canning factory alone, heart-hungry, suspected. Annie was a martyr to Virtue. But was she justified?

The ranchman, Fred and Dolly observed him, and calling in several ranch hands, they gave chase.

But the earth gave way and Jose fell to the bottom of the shaft, where, after a struggle, he was overpowered by Fred. Dolly and the others hear Fred's calls for help. THE TREY O' HEARTS—MIRAGE (Twelfth Episode—Two Parts—Oct. 20).—Judith, lashed to the back of the runaway, is carried at a mad pace along the upper trail through the mountains and foothills, and eventually out into the desert. Alan follows the flight of the horse, expecting momentarily to see Judith dashed to death. He tells Rose and Barcus of the affair, mounts his own horse, and started off to the rescue. Rose and Barcus break camp and plan to follow. Meantime, Trine's car, containing Trine, Jim, the butler and the chauffeur, arrives at Mesa, takes up Marrophat, and sets off in pursuit again. Steed, a gentleman of Hopi Jim's Kidney, happens along the other trail, discovers the two horses, and is puzzling the matter over when he is joined by several other rough citizens of Mesa, who have started out to follow the fun, promised by what they have already seen. Murder being indicated, they organize a lynching party and set off for the upper trail. Judith's horse, meantime, has run well out into the desert. When he stops Judith manages to release herself, and falls to the ground. The horse roams off and finally locates a water hole. Refreshed, Judith manages to climb to his back, and the horse strikes off on the desert trail away from the mountains. Alan, by the use of his glasses, locates the moving speck, and presses on in pursuit.

By mid-afternoon he is overcome with thirst and heat. Barcus and Rose follow upon the trail, and by the merging of hoof prints they learn that Alan has pursued Judith into the dangerous part of the desert. They continue, but are soon overtaken by the Vigilance Committee, whose temper proves to be anything but friendly. Trine's automobile eventually falls in a poor fate in the race across the desert. Judith's horse leads her to a water hole. She dismounts, and seeks water and rest. Alan, who is close at hand, does not observe her there. At this point the sky thickens, and with hardly a moment's notice, a terrific sand storm breaks forth. Alan, thinking that Judith is helplessly tied to the horse's back, pushes on. It is only by accident that he stumbles across Judith. Judith, realizing the motive which has brought him there, offers her hand in friendly thanks. Alan, on the other hand, is furious at finding the girl safe and well able to care for herself. He strikes aside her offered hand, and rushes out again into the storm. Judith follows, and finally overtakes him, when he falls exhausted down an embankment.

The storm is the only thing which saves Barcus and Rose from the Vigilants. In the course of their progress they pass within a few feet which shelter Judith and Alan, the latter unconscious. Judith sees them, but says nothing. Barcus and Rose pass on in ignorance. When the storm falls it is night. Alan finally comes around. He staggers to his feet, climbs out of the aroyo, and starts off again across the desert, paying no attention to Judith. She follows with the same patience as before. This time it is Alan who is under necessity of helping the girl. When she falls to her knees with cold and exhaustion, he wraps his coat around her, and holds her in his arms. Exhaustion overtakes them both, and Alan finally finds comfort in sleep.

Meanwhile, Trine's car, after being held up in the storm, continues on the trail, finally coming up with the Vigilance Committee. Marrophat and Trine indicate Alan as the murderer of Hopi Jim. There are two routes that form the southern barrier of the desert. The motor car strikes up toward one—the Vigilants toward the others. It is Marrophat that first spies Judith and Alan. Judith snatches Alan's revolver from its hostler. She has her own as well. Alan sleeps. When Marrophat, Jim and the butler approach, Judith calmly commands them to throw up their hands. She forces Jim and the butler to carry Alan to the car. When Trine grows turbulent she forces Jim to gag him. Then, jumping into the car with Alan and her father, she orders the chauffeur forward. Marrophat and the butler, left behind, manage, by their howling, to attract the attention of the Vigilants. Taking the two men upon their horses, the Vigilants start in pursuit of the automobile. Steed, his horse swifter than the others, gets within pistol shot, and punctures the rear tire. Judith answers by shooting his horse from under him. The car, now crippled, moves slowly, and the pursuing Vigilants are soon upon them. Rose and Barcus, meanwhile, have made the shelter of a prospector's shack overlooking the pass. They hear the shots and the galloping horses. Realizing trouble, Barcus conceives the notion of blocking the pass when the car has passed. He has found dynamite in the shack, and this he plants in the hillside. He waits to light the fuse when the car passes underneath. There is a terrific explosion, and an avalanche of rock and dirt sweeps down the mountain to cut off the pursuit.

Rose, Judith, Alan and Barcus are now temporarily safe.

IN THE DAYLIGHT (Two Parts—Oct. 19).—Arthur, studying music under Gordon, is more interested in club life. Gordon reports to Steele, his uncle, that he is neglecting his work and ruining his eyes under the night lights and is possibly on the verge of blindness. "He has great genius, if it could only be brought out," the old man explains. Steele determines to take a hand. He sends Arthur out into the open country, with the opening of the hunting season. Here Arthur's interests change. He meets and falls in love with Marie, an orphaned girl living in the mountains. In an accident the guide, also in love with Marie, is killed. Arthur arranges to care for his mother and seeks to console Marie.

Arthur's interests in his new open life are becoming crystallized. His habits change and he finds new inspiration at the piano, the only pretentious piece of furniture in Marie's shack. He is summoned to the city by his uncle's death and there soon falls into the old habits. The destruction of his sight begins again and he is told that he is going blind and cannot be cured. To escape the pity of his friends he flees to the country. Here blindness comes, but with it happiness. Marie insists he needs her and forces the marriage.

The affliction and happy marriage results in an inspired composition. It becomes the hit of the season. This results in Arthur's being dug out of his retirement and brought to the city with his wife. A new medical discovery brings restoration of his sight. With the return of his sight he yields to the old temptation. Final realization causes him to return to the old shack with the intention of deliberately destroying his sight again, so that he can live a worthy life. Marie hurries after him in time to save him.

Several months before this MacFarlane has advised Audrey Austin, a young illustrator, whose home is in the Western town, to go to New York to realize her ambitions. The girl has not succeeded in the big town, and in her lonely disheartened state, has become intimate with a Mrs. Carson, who is the accomplice of Henry Dupree, a crook. MacFarlane, knowing that his conviction is unjust, escapes to New York. He chances to run into Audrey and her pretended friends just in time to save her from being made the scapegoat of a robbery which they have perpetrated. In bringing the crooks to justice, MacFarlane is obliged to disclose his identity. His offense, however, is pardoned on his return West with Audrey, who becomes his wife.

But she rejects his offer of marriage and returns to Jim. Her old sweetheart discovers that Nell really loves Ronalds, but that a mistaken sense of honor bids her remain faithful to her first affection. Cassius and Winnie flee in the former's automobile with Pa on horseback in hot pursuit. Punctured tire enables Pa to overtake elopers. Pa pummels Cassius and takes Winnie home.

Cassius, resolving to win Winnie, confides in his friend, Willie Wise, who offers aid. Wise, disguised, offers to sell Pa $500 counterfeit for $50 legal tender and proves the purchasing power of the alleged counterfeit (in reality good money previously furnished by Cassius). Pa accepts the proposition. Later Wise returns disguised as a secret service agent and arrests Pa and relieves him of the $500 belonging to Chex. Pa pleads for mercy, pleading ignorance. Cassius appears by prearranged plan and pretends to recognize the officer as an old friend. Pa entreats Cassius to help him, agreeing to withdraw objections to the marriage. Matters are brought to a head when Mary rescues Laura, who drops to the street with exhaustion due to ill nourishment. Taking her home in her motor car, Mary sees for herself how the girl is forced to live. She pleads with her father to better his employes' condition. But he stubbornly refuses. Mary leaves her luxurious home to become a working girl herself, and weeks later, her father discovers her in a shirtwaist factory. Meanwhile, she has met Frank Bell at the settlement house. Their interests are identical. One day Laura's landlady comes to the settlement with word that Laura is dying. Mary and Bell both go to see her, and thus the latter discovers that she is his own sister. Bell compels Ashton, at the point of a gun, to go to Laura's bedside. At dinner time the country cousin shows some timidity about appearing at the table, fearing that his country manners will disgrace him. But Polly tells him to do everything that Peter does, and not to worry. Billy imitates the husband's every move. Peter becomes enraged. But his wife pacifies him and he kisses her. Billy hastens to repeat this also. The husband gets after his cousin-in-law with a gun. He takes refuge on the roof of the porch. The gun accidentally goes off, and Billy is hit. The sentimental young woman, Violette Jenks, and her husband are living at the same hotel where Puglichesi is stopping, and later the great virtuoso is seen crawling along an ironing-board, many stories high in the air, to get from his room to the bride's apartment. Violin in hand, he makes the passage in safety—only to fly to direr evils. To save reputations, the violinist is forced to clip off his long hair and become temporarily a bungling butler. His adventures with the detectives and the jealous husband, with Violette beside herself with excitement, are excruciatingly funny.

THE BENEVOLENCE OF CONDUCTOR 786 (Oct. 9).—Conductor 786 rescues Baby Helen, who has wandered onto the electric tracks. He takes her home, and discovers that she has twin sisters, and a mother, the latter very ill with consumption. The doctor tells the conductor that if Mrs. Smith could go to the mountains there would be some hope of her recovery. Not long after, the superintendent of the road gives the old conductor a banquet to celebrate his twenty-fifth year in the company's employ. The men call on him for a speech. He asks to be excused for a few minutes, and soon returns with the twins and Helen. Then he tells the men about the children's mother and appeals to them for help. A generous collection is taken up, and two days later Conductor 786 puts the Smith family on board the Adirondack express.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 39 (Oct. 12).—Margaret, with Baby Lily's jewel in the little bag hanging on her wrist, stood looking into the muzzle of the young man's gun. Evidently, he had no sense of humor. So, what in the world could she do? Well, the serious sort were susceptible to flattery, and she might cajole him at least into letting her put down her aching arms.

"Don't be silly," said she. Then, for the first time, she smiled. And those who have seen the effulgence of that manoeuvre can imagine the thumps of the young man's heart in instant response. "Surely, you must realize that I am not a burglar," she added.

They kept up a rapid fire of repartee, if not of shells, until, in a happy inspiration, she accused him of threatening her with an unloaded gun. Actually made uncertain, he investigated. Two shells fell out of the breach to the floor. Margaret snatched them up and scampered for the door. He chased her to the hedge across the grounds—and again she was prisoner, this time before a gun that was unquestionably reloaded.

"Couldn't we sit down?" she asked.

He marched her back to the Hamilton's front porch, they sat down; neither spoke. Meanwhile, unseen by them, a tall, lean man had made his way across the lawn, and had shinned up the column of the porch on the side of the house, to Miss Hamilton's room. When he came down again, the jewel marked with a B was in his pocket. He ran to the road, and jumping into an automobile, drove away at high speed. If Margaret could have seen him she would have recognized Lily's father.

But she and young Hamilton were absorbed in what was becoming a very wearisome situation. Margaret longed to escape home to Aunt Abbie and Baby Lily. Besides, she was hungry. This latter craving she confessed to her captor, and was promptly walked around to the pantry window and directed to "pick a pie" from the shelf. Returning, they devoured it together. Then Hamilton, when her head was turned, ven-

No matter how thrilling a story one may read, interest is not sustained if poor type, poor paper and poor press work make hard work for the eyes. It's the same with motion pictures. A clear picture is as necessary as a good scenario.

Because the basic product is right, the clearest pictures are on "Eastman" film. Look for the stencil mark in the margin.

tured cautiously to unload the gun and stand it against the house. He began pacing up and down. In a flash Margaret had the weapon in her hands.

"Now we'll turn the tables'" she cried.

"Pardon me, it really isn't loaded," he answered. But instantly producing the two shells she had picked off the floor, Our Mutual Girl loaded it. And this time it was Hamilton who held up his hands.

However he succeeded in outwitting her, getting possession of the gun again, and the old tete-a-tete was resumed. Miss Hamilton's return cut short another tedious silence. Her brother was greatly relieved to see by her greeting that Margaret was a friend and a neighbor of hers, and that after all he would not be called upon to land this very attractive young lady behind prison bars—for of course soon they would have the real explanation from her. He promised for the present, however, not to say anything to his sister about what had happened, and very willingly allowed Our Mutual Girl to return home.

Miss Hamilton, meanwhile, had gone upstairs to take off her hat. When she came down, she scarcely noticed for a moment that her guest was gone. "Oh, Ralph'" she cried, tears starting to her eyes, "Somebody's been in the house and robbed us. One of my jewels is gone'"

Ralph was stunned. So she was a burglar after all" but what could he tell his sister?

OUT OF THE DEPUTY'S HANDS (Oct. 21) — Deputy Sheriff Martin of Arizona is in love with Lola, a waitress at the Gold Dollar restaurant. He comes into Gold Dollar on the trail of James Kinney, who is wanted for murder. Kinney is discovered at work in the mine under an assumed name, and the sheriff learns that he is very attentive to Lola. This enrages Martin. During an accident, Kinney goes down into the mine with a gang of men to prevent it being flooded. Martin joins him, and they work side by side until they collapse from exhaustion. Then Kinney confesses to Martin that he killed a man named Marcus for beating Lola, who, he claimed, was his step-daughter. The two men are dug out of the mine. Martin resigns as deputy sheriff and escorts Kinney safely away. Then Martin and Lola are left to each other.

THE WORD OF HIS PEOPLE (Two Parts—Oct. 16).—Colonel Scranton, the stricken commander of Fort Pixley, has a turn for the worse and telegraphs for his son, Lieutenant Drake Scranton, to come immediately. Drake arrives just before his father dies, and his father tells him how Iris Wheathley's mother once saved his life and nursed him through a fever, and that Drake's foremost thought must be to make Iris, whom the Colonel adopted when her mother died, happy. Drake falls in love with Iris, who is in love with Lieutenant Orth, but she promises to marry Drake, as it was his father's dying wish. Drake learns that Iris is only marrying him for his father's sake and releases her. Her engagement to Orth is announced that night.

A week later Sioux scouts returning to the main village seek to ambush one of the plainsmen. He escapes to the fort after killing two of the Indians. The remaining Indians ride to the fort and demand that the plainsmen be turned over to them. The commanding officer refuses their demand. They return to their village, round up all the Indians and attack the fort. The fort is burned. Iris, Drake and Orth escape from the fort but are spied by some of the Indians and pursued to the quicksands. Drake saves Iris and Orth but is swallowed by the quicksands.

SHORTY AND SHERLOCK HOLMES (Two Parts—Oct. 21).—Shorty, who has been reading "The Sign of the Four," is much taken up with the idea of becoming a detective. He thinks it a great idea, and going out to the stable pulls enough hairs from a horse's tail to make himself a beard; this he dons, together with a "sleuth" hat, and getting himself a large microscope, defies the world to conceal a thing from him. He trails everybody in camp, and spies upon them so much that he becomes a pest and they frame up a "jool" robbery. Norah, the cook, pretends to have lost her diamond pin and Shorty undertakes to find it for her. That same night the village postoffice is robbed, and Shorty in hunting for the diamond pin happens upon the robbers, who are burying their loot. They overpower Shorty and binding his hands and feet, make him their prisoner. While they are reconnoitering, Shorty burns the ropes off his hands with his trusty microscope. When he hears the robbers returning he throws himself back onto the sand, and gives the appearance of still being bound. While the robbers have their backs turned he covers them with his pistol. He shoots one robber and marches the other before him to the village sheriff, the robber carrying the mail pouch containing the loot. Ella, the village postmistress, who has been taken into custody pending an investigation of the robbery, is released when Shorty appears with the real robber.

JIMMY (Two Parts—Oct. 15).—Jimmy, a newsboy, is the sole support of his mother and crippled sister, Mary. His mother reads of the arrival in the city of Dr. Lobel, a noted European surgeon, and his offer to treat a number of patients at a free clinic. She and Jimmy see in this the chance of a lifetime to have Mary cured.

Mary is taken to the hospital and while Jimmy is holding her place in the line of waiting patients, the surgeon announces that he will not have time to treat more patients as he has to leave at once to catch the steamship to return to Paris. Jimmy, deeply disappointed, pleads with the surgeon. Dr. Lobel telephones the officials of the steamship and persuades them to hold the vessel for a half hour. After the operation the doctor rushes to the pier in time to see the vessel steaming down the bay, but the captain of a tugboat near at hand loads the party into his boat and succeeds in overtaking the steamship.

THE SPOTTED PANTHER (Three Parts).—Captain Corcoran reads that the Academy of Sciences will pay fifty thousand pounds to whoever recovers the original manuscript of the Gouroularemtah, the first of sacred books of the Hindus. Corcoran is a man of iron. He embarks for the Indies. His first visit is to the palace of the old Maharajah Holkar. His servant follows him, and Louisa, his retained panther, goes before. Striking with his silver hammer a sonorous song, Holkar's slaves come bounding in and seize the intruders. Louisa drives them away. Sita, daughter of old Maharajah Holkar, finds Captain Corcoran charming.

The Maharajah and the colonel breathe out threatenings of slaughter against each other. General Rao, a traitor, is to set fire to the town and lead Princess Sita to the colonel. A spy from the English camp informs Corcoran, who penetrates the English camp, and is well received by Barclay, but the captain, knowing that Sita has been taken prisoner, forces Barclay into a large trunk, upon which he writes: "The colonel is in the trunk," and after releasing Sita, carries her off.

The fugitives proceed to defend themselves against the traitor, Rao, and the English soldiers. They are only repulsed when Rao is killed. Songriva, one of Corcoran's followers, when leaning on the base of a statue, discovers a subterranean passage. The statue revolves and gives passage to the little band.

The victorious adventurer and the princess return to the palace, to find the English have burnt the town shortly after the captain and Sita are wed.

SYNDICATE FILM CORP.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode 16—Reels 31 and 32).—The capture of the crooks in their attempt to wrest the secret of the vanished treasure from old Jones, made the conspirators weary. It was not long before they recommenced their operations. The prize was too great to permit them to lay aside their hopes of getting possession of the Hargreave fortune. This time fate played into their hands. The Countess Olga, who still possessed Florence's confidence, called one day at the Hargreave home. Soon afterward, Susan, Florence's friend, was taken mysteriously ill. At once there was a great excitement. Only the Countess kept her head. She recommended calling a certain Dr. Webster to aid the stricken girl. Florence begged her to telephone for him.

Her hurried call brought Braine, disguised in a beard and big horn glasses, who, as the pseudo Dr. Webster, after ministering to Susan, declared complete rest at the seashore would be the only cure for her malady. Both girls at once set out for a quiet beach resort near the city, where Norton could run down over the week ends. The two enjoyed themselves greatly. Susan showed marked improvement. Norton came down and joined them and there were many delightful parties on the ocean's edge and canoe trips on the river. One day the pseudo Dr. Webster appeared, ostensibly to visit his patient, stayed to enjoy the salt breezes himself, and thereafter events began to happen.

In accordance with a well-laid plan, he paid a professional call on Florence and Susan. While the latter was absent, he persuaded Florence, who was indisposed, to drink a preparation containing a powerful drug. Then with consummate audacity, as soon as she had fallen under its effects, he informs the hotel office that she has contracted smallpox and that rigid quarantine must be enforced until he can notify the health officials. Later he appears with two confederates and an ambulance, ostensibly from the pest house, and makes ready to carry Florence away.

Susan, learning of Florence's plight, sends for Norton. The two, after vainly seeking to get past the guard at the door, climb down the fire-escape from Norton's room, only to find Florence unconscious on the couch, where the conspirators have laid her. Susan takes her place on the couch, while Norton carries Florence, beginning to recover her senses, out on the fire-escape to the roof. The conspirators returning discover the ruse, and after binding and gagging Susan give chase to the others, but without success. Then they carry Susan to the waiting ambulance, which sets off toward the pest house.

On the road the vehicle overtakes Florence and Norton, who are hastening from the danger which threatens. Only one of the gang the driver of the ambulance—is with it, Braine and the others having set out in pursuit of Florence and Norton. Telling Florence to flee, Norton attacks the ruffian, and after a desperate struggle fells him. Making certain the man is senseless, he hastens to free Susan, but hardly has done so when he hears Florence calling for help. In her flight she has rushed unawares upon a treacherous quicksand and before she is able to turn and retrace her steps she has found herself struggling in its depths.

Were it not for her warning cry, Norton, running to her rescue, would also have become engulfed. He draws back just in time. He runs back to the ambulance for the rope which has bound Susan. At the side of the marsh is a telephone pole from which is strung a strong cable and up this Norton hastily climbs. He works his way out on this cable sailor-fashion, until he is directly over Florence, who by this time has sunk into the quicksand up to her armpits. Throwing her the rope, Norton climbs down the pole again, and after several moments of strenuous effort drags the exhausted girl to terra firma, hurrying with her to the ambulance, where terrified Susan is awaiting them. Norton drives off, just as the conspirator, who had been knocked senseless, begins to recover consciousness.

ENGLAND EXPECTS (Two Parts).—Germany declares war on England and the news comes into one English home like an imperious bugle call. In this family are four generations—the great-grandfather, whose medals commemorate the occasion on which he saved the colors in the Crimean War, the grandfather, a veteran of the Boer War, the father, a prosperous business man, his brother, an unmarried volunteer officer, and the children of the business man. The two veterans have regretfully to admit that they are too old for service at the present crisis, but the younger one is consoled by the fact that he has "two sons for the king." The volunteer officer joins his regiment and leaves for the front, but for the business man matters are not so simple. He has his wife and children to think of, and there are other good reasons for acting with deliberation. His wife sees his hesitation. "You are thinking of me," she says. "You should only think of your country." There is almost accusation in her attitude. Still the business man hesitates. He sees enthusiastic troops marching to the front. His own clerks shut their desks and hurry off to enlist. In his own home his grandfather is telling his children how he saved the colors, and teaching them to lead their leaden soldiers against the wooden fortifications of the Germans. He feels that he must get away from this electric atmosphere, and he decides to vanish for a few days. He hastily packs a small bag, puts a cap in his pocket and prepares to set out, but even yet he has no escape from the influences around him. He goes to his desk to get money for his immediate needs, and his hand disturbs a packet of old love letters from his wife. The very first one catches his eye: "I cannot tell how proud I am to be marrying into a family that has served their country as has yours." He stiffens, and doubt comes to him. His hand mechanically falls on a book and he sees that it is "The Life of Nelson." He goes, torn by indecision, to take a last farewell of his children in their nursery. "Will papa save the colors, too?" he hears one of them naively asking. He can hold out no longer. He sees that there is no course open to him save one, and he looks up to his eager, expectant wife with a smile. "I enlist to-morrow," he says.

PARAMOUNT.

MARTA OF THE LOWLANDS (Five Parts—Famous Players).—Marta is a beggar child, who is adopted by Sebastien, the wealthy landowner. Sebastien makes Marta his victim. He wishes to marry a wealthy woman, but at the same time retain his influence over Marta. He therefore arranges through Tomas, the hermit, to marry her to Manelich, a simple, untutored shepherd living in the mountains—a rough child of nature who kills wolves with his bare hands and knows naught of guile and deceit. The wedding is performed, Manelich being under the impression that Marta loves him, and being truly in love with her. Later he learns he has been tricked, while Marta, who had at first believed that Manelich had been bought with the master's gold to become her husband, finds her conclusion wrong, the honesty of his love compelling her own. Then come developments which make the drama one of the most passionate, intense, trenchant character studies ever created.

Marta is a patient sufferer, a tragic figure indeed, as she bravely endures all the cruelty and indignities that are thrust upon her by the ruthless "master." We witness the poignancy of her grief, the restraint and the anguish of the oppressed woman; and her movements among the treacherous characters of her environment.

LOVES AND ADVENTURES IN THE LIFE OF SHAKESPEARE (Five Parts).—When the film opens we see the youth, Shakespeare, composing poems, instead of working in the office of Lawyer Grasp, whose apprentice he is. The lawyer soon dismisses the youth from his service, but meanwhile the humbly born lad manages to get into the society of the great. He has succeeded in assisting Charlotte Clopton, of Clopton Hall, and is received by her father and his friends, from whom he wins appreciation for his art.

While this is developing, quite another tale is unfolding in the secret room of Clopton Hall, where Sir Hugh Clopton has sheltered an emissary of the Pope, not knowing the mission of the secret agent is to assassinate the Protestant Queen Elizabeth. The agent's purpose is discovered and he is killed, unknown to Sir Hugh, who is giving a birthday dance to his daughter. Charlotte dies of the dreadful plague.

Some month later Shakespeare is trying to forget his grief over the death of Charlotte at the Twelfth Night Revels, and in so doing meets and champions Anne Hathaway. The courtship is sealed in the historic Anne Hathaway cottage, in which the young couple go after their marriage. Here, however, Shakespeare finds that the beautiful young girl has developed into the shrewish wife, and, further tormented by a prosecution poaching, he determines to leave his native town and go to London.

Shakespeare, with little money, his coat and his staff, reaches London, and sees the great crowds which throng through old St. Paul's. He watches outside of the Globe theater—the first theater ever built—to see the actors pass in and out, and from that point the spectator is shown his steady rise to fame and fortune. Shakespeare, in his life, was the friend and companion of all the great ones of his time, and the film faithfully shows this interesting phase of his career. Raleigh, Drake, the Earl of Essex and Queen Elizabeth all unite to do him honor on the occasion of the first presentation of "Romeo and Juliet." In the final stages of the film Shakespeare is shown dreaming, at the end of his career, of the wonderful plays which have made him famous, while glimpses of scenes from them pass before his dreaming eyes.

HEARTS UNITED (Four Parts).—Allen Dodd, professor of Ethnology in an eastern college, succeeds in locating Robert Harris, son of an old college chum, and invites him to come east for a visit. Professor Dodd's secret wish is that Robert Harris and his daughter, Alma, will become sweethearts. Robert's heart is weak, and owing to the excitement of preparation for his long journey he collapses. His death suggests an opportunity to Robert Haines, a gambler, whose similarity to Robert Harris has often mystified their home town. Haines decides to impersonate the dead man, and try for the hand of Alma, who is an heiress to a large fortune. Professor Dodd and Alma unsuspectingly accept him as Robert Harris, but the girl has already given her affection to Joe Craig, her father's chauffeur. Haines discovers this, convinces Alma that Joe is a married man, and she curtly dismisses him. Deeply wounded by her refusal, Joe starts for the northwest in search of a reported lost mine.

Alma discovers the trick, and goes to Joe's house, only to find that he has already departed. As the professor has often desired to study the northwest Indians, Alma succeeds in getting him to take her near the place where Joe is located. Haines, learning of their plans, disguises himself as a professor, and meets Dodd and his daughter. In the meantime Joe has been well received by the Indians, and "The real future of the picture business stands firmly on offerings of such quality. . . . One sees many pictures that have no art at all; here is one that is all art. . . . Our experience leads us to commend the picture highly, alike for the least and the most critical kind of general audience. It is a human picture for all humanity."

—Moving Picture World.

". . . A wonderfully interesting insight into the workings of the prison system, and affording a vehicle for one of the finest character actors yet seen on this side of the water in motion pictures. His name is Hertel and it is devoutly to be hoped that the film fans in this country will be given an opportunity to see more of his work. . . . Haines then attempts to abduct her, but her father arrives on the scene, and after a lively flight Haines throws him over a cliff into the river. Alma, by a well aimed rock, stuns Haines and flees to Joe's cabin.

Joe rescues Professor Dodd, and Haines succeeds in paying some ruffians to attack Joe's cabin. A doctor who is attending the professor gallantly aids in the defense. Waterlily discovers the situation, and goes for help to her father. The defenders are overcome by the outlaws. Haines offers to save all the lives if Alma will but marry him. In the nick of time Waterlily comes back leading her Indians. The gambler Haines is killed, and the outlaws made prisoners. Alma and Joe find happiness in their love.

THE HERO OF THE NORTH (Two Parts).—Three men are in love with Eva, the daughter of Jonathan Edwards, who has established a pioneer store in a new settlement in Saskatchewan, Canada. Ned Milligan is Eva's accepted suitor. Jules Riel, a French half-breed, is violenty jealous of him, while Long-Arm, an Indian brave, stoically accepts his rejection. Ned Milligan is a Northwest Mounted Police officer.

Jules decides to abduct Eva, and takes her to his hut in the woods. He waylays her, but Eva's screams is heard by both Ned and Long-Arm, who hurry in its direction. They arrive too late, but meeting each other in the woods they are mutually suspicious, and separate. Ned returns to Edwards store, and finds that Eva had gone to a nearby Indian settlement to purchase basketwork. Visiting the Indians' wigwam, Ned discovers that Eva left an hour previously. At that moment Long-Arm arrives, and Ned questions him suspiciously, which the Indian resents, denying all knowledge of the girl's whereabouts. Ned finally picks up the trail of Jules, and follows him into the woods. Meanwhile Jules has carried Eva off to the river, and in his canoe paddled ten miles downstream, where he disembarks and goes into the woods with the unconscious victim.

Both Long-Arm and Ned follow the trail. Ned's horse breaks his leg, and after shooting the animal Ned resumes his search afoot. Long-Arm searches in his canoe for the point where Jules must disembark. In the meantime Jules gloats over Eva in the hut, and tells her that although he could easily force her to be his, he prefers to hear her say "I love you" first. He ties her in the tree, saying that when the wildcats come she will be glad to call to Jules.

A series of exciting incidents follow before Ned and Long-Arm succeed in freeing Eva, while Jules is mortally wounded in the struggle. The Indian is a good loser, and seeing that Eva loves only Ned places her hand in his and silently paddles away to leave them to their joy.

SAVING THE COLORS (Three Parts).—Ronald, the squire's son, falls from his horse and breaks his leg. He is carried with all speed to a neighboring hospital, where he is placed in charge of Ruth Williams, a beautiful and devoted nurse, who takes more than a passing interest in her charge. When Ronald arrives at the convalescent stage the two young people discover that they are in love with each other. Reluctantly, Ruth gives her consent to a speedy marriage, only hesitating on the score of the difference in their social positions. Ronald overrules all Ruth's objections, and the marriage takes place.

Returning from their honeymoon, Ruth is conveyed by Ronald to his luxurious home, where everything fills Ruth with delight, and at first their happiness is complete. Soon after they settle down, they give a grand reception and ball, at which all Ronald's aristocratic friends appear and have their first introduction to his bride. Overwhelmed with her surroundings, poor Ruth's ignorance of society usages and her gaucherie make her a laughing stock among the ladies, who are jealous of Ruth's success in securing the catch of the season. Ruth overhears a group discussing her and commenting upon her awkwardness. She rushes upon them with indignation, and denounces them bitterly, with the result that they complain to Ronald of his wife's rudeness, and leave the house.

Ronald defends his friends when Ruth makes her complaint, and their first real quarrel takes place. Ruth goes reluctantly to her room, and Ronald enters the billiard room and tries to drown his disappointment in liquor. Next morning news of the outbreak of histilities on the continent reaches London, and all is excitement. As the days go on the excitement increases, and when England declares war against Germany, the whole country is roused to a state of frenzy, and graphic pictures show us the mobilization of troops and its incidental excitements.

Ronald leads an idle dissipated life, spends his time among his old acquaintances, rousing the jealousy of his wife, who is broken-hearted at his behavior. The preparations for war provide her with abundant means for forgetting her own troubles, and her heart yearns for those who are going forth to defend their country's honor. Ultimately, disgusted with her husband's behavior and apathy as to his country's call, Ruth decides to go to the front as a nurse, and denounces her husband as a coward.

The night of Ruth's departure Ronald has all the old set to dinner, and tells them what his wife has done. They laugh at the incident, and in the billiard room they take up a portrait of Ruth and are ridiculing it when Ronald enters, and at last his manliness asserts itself, and, defending his persecuted wife, he indignantly orders them out as "revilers of a good woman's name." Ronald now sees things in a different light, and determines to give up drink and endeavor to atone in some way for his past weakness. His men-servants' departure in a body to join the army at length determines him to obey his country's call, and we soon see him taking his part in the various stirring incidents in Belgium.

At Liege he distingushes himself, while at Mons he assists to beat back the Germans, being in the midst of a dashing cavalry charge. Incident after incident of a stirring character takes place, and at length a spirited engagement occurs. The colors are captured by the enemy, but Ronald bravely fights his way and recaptures them. A chance shot, however, brings him down just as he reaches safety. His comrades pick him up and carry him into the hospital tent, where Ruth once more attends him and by her devotion brings him back to life. All is forgiven and the two once more take up their duties at home until Ronald is fit to resume his place again in defence of his country.

Later Violet travels the "Path Forbidden," carousing with male friends, and is finally driven out by the husband, Joe Brill. She wishes to take one of the twin children, but the husband forbids. So she steals one little girl and takes her away.

Years later we see the twins grown to womanhood. Neither know of the existence of the other. Pearl, the stolen one, is leading the life her mother led when alive. Lucy is the aid and comfort of the father, who, through unwise investments, loses his money, the shock of which causes a stroke and is removed to an asylum. Lucy then runs a country hotel.

MYSTERY OF MR. MARKS.—Edward Denton is an elderly widower with one child, Isobel, a lovely girl of about 19. Owing to the failure of a bank he is in financial difficulties. He telephones to Marks, who is a rich financier, and asks him if he can help him. Marks at first professes himself quite unable to do anything; but a chance meeting with Isobel alters his opinion. He promises Denton that he will see him out of his difficulties on the day that Isobel becomes his wife. The girl is already engaged to a young fellow called Gerald Lee, and will not listen to the idea. There is a quarrel between Marks and Gerald at a ball.

A little later the two men appear to have made up their quarrel, for presently Isobel finds them engaged in an absorbing game of cards. Gerald, when the game is over, owes Marks $1,500. Gerald vows he has been cheated. The next morning they find Marks lying in his bed dead, somebody having strangled him in his sleep. Suspicion immediately falls on Gerald Lee, and the young fellow is led away to be kept in custody until the coroner's inquest. Isobel refuses to believe that Gerald is guilty and sets out to unravel the mystery for herself. She begins by searching the room of the murdered man, and discovers a button which does not seem to belong to any of the clothes in the room. Her discoveries, however, only seem to lead from bad to worse, for after a prolonged search she finds that the button belongs to a suit of pajamas of her father's, while on looking further she discovers the key of Marks' bedroom hidden in the pocket of his dressing-gown. The poor girl is now confronted with a terrible dilemma. She finds in her father's bedroom a book entitled "The Stranglers." Recollecting that her father has in the past frequently walked in his sleep, it suddenly occurs to her that perhaps the book so worked upon his imagination that he committed the murder unconsciously while walking in his sleep. She decides to watch, and that night sees her father wander through the house quite unconscious of what he is doing or where he is going. After a miserable night of indecision, she finds that the way is made clear for her, for a terrified gardener reports that her father was found lying dead in the garden, having apparently fallen from an upper window. She immediately phones to Scotland Yard for a detective, to whom she shows the different pieces of evidence which she has collected.

Her evidence soon places a new construction on matters, and Gerald is triumphantly acquitted amid the plaudits of the crowd. Thus Isobel is consoled for the death of her father by the thought that by her efforts she has saved her lover, and that a bright and happy future stretches before them both.

CINDER ELFRED.—Elfred is an impecunious artist who paints very good pictures, but, unfortunately, finds them rather hard to sell. He is, however, a joyful mortal. One day when his finances are at a particularly low ebb, he is cheered by the news that a very wealthy American, Mr. Coppernickle, is coming to pay him a visit and to have a look at some of his pictures. Elfred immediately begins to build castles in the air, and joyfully informs his three chums of the good luck which has befallen him.

Mr. Coppernickle duly arrives, accompanied by his beautiful daughter Sadie; but unfortunately he does not seem much impressed with Elfred's pictures, and finally departs without buying any. Sadie, however, thinks that Elfred and his three chums are good fun, and she invited them to a dance which she is giving the following evening. His chums are delighted, but, unfortunately, this is small compensation to Elfred, who not only relied on selling some of his pictures, but, what is worse, his dress suit is in pawn, and he is therefore unable to accept the invitation. He attempts to borrow the necessary garments from his friends, but finds that this is impossible, as, not unnaturally, they have only one dress suit each. The next afternoon, while his pals are getting ready for the ball, Elfred falls asleep and has a very curious dream. Like Cinderella, he dreams that a fairy visits him and provides him with a beautiful new dress suit on condition that he leaves the ball by 2 o'clock.

Only too delighted at being able to go, Elfred accepts the conditions and sets off for the ball in triumph. Unfortunately, however, in the ardor of proposing to the beautiful Miss Sadie, he forgets all about the fairy and her warning. The clock strikes twelve, and in an instant his beautiful dress suit vanishes, and he is left sitting on the settee in his underclothes. Sadie's horrified stare shows him what has happened, and, hastily seizing a curtain, he wraps himself in it, and makes his escape amid the laughter of the assembled visitors.

At this point a noise awakens him and he finds to his surprise that it is all a dream. It is a dream, however, which destined to have a happy ending, for his landlady enters the room with a letter which has just arrived for him, which, on being opened, is found to contain a check for $150 from Mr. Coppernickle, who, it appears, has changed his mind, and is going to buy two of Elfred's pictures after all. The landlady is hastily sent out with this newly-acquired wealth to redeem Elfred's dress suit from the clutches of the pawnbroker. Hastily arraying himself, Elfred hurries round to the ball to find Sadie being made desperate love to by his three chums. Elfred's arrival, however, changes the look of things and in a few minutes, to their great disgust, he has secured Sadie all to himself, and he is soon proposing to her in a secluded corner of the conservatory.

In the middle of his proposal the clock strikes twelve, and a shiver runs through Elfred as he remembers his vivid dream and the awful consequences which followed. This time, however, nothing happens, and his dress suit kindly condescends to remain in its proper place. The proposal is carried through to a triumphant conclusion, and all ends happily.

THE MYSTERY OF EDWIN DROOD (Shubert—Five Parts).—A young couple, Edwin Drood and Rosa Bud, are engaged to be married. This is not a love affair, but a marriage of convenience, according to the wills of their parents. They, however, are very fond of each other in a platonic friendship. John Jasper, a young uncle of Edwin Drood, leader of the choir and organist of Cloisterham Cathedral, unknown to Edwin Drood, is madly in love with Rosa. His passion for her is so intense that it drives him to the despair of opium, and, in secret, he practices this vice in all manner of low places. A young man called Neville Landless is also in love with Rosa, and his feelings of jealousy and enmity to Drood are, at times, inflamed secretly by John Jasper. There is a quarrel after dinner one night at Jasper's house, and that night Edwin Drood disappears. Jasper immediately arouses the village to suspect Neville Landless, who, in the morning after Drood's disappearance, left the village for a walking tour. A warrant is issued and Neville is brought back. Charged with the murder, he is imprisoned. No sign of Drood, though, comes to hand. The river is dragged, but without result. In the meantime, Neville's sister, Helena, disappears, and shortly after a mysterious stranger under the name of Mr. Datchery, appears in Cloisterham, takes rooms near John Jasper, and commences secret inquiries. A peculiar woman in black, the keeper of the opium den which John Jasper visits in London, also shadows Jasper. It is at this exciting period that the book finishes, stopped by the death of Charles Dickens, and writers of many minds have endeavored to fit in the concluding chapters of this story. In the concluding chapters of this story. In Mr. Terriss' version on the screen he presents John Jasper as having plotted to kill Edwin Drood, but Drood succeeds in making his escape through the quiet offices of the elusive character of Datchery, who in his opinion is known as Helena Landless disguised as a man.

A FIGHT FOR LOVE (Pyramid—Three Parts).—Hope Adams, a country girl, had the misfortune to inspire love in the hearts of two men. Richard Lester, one of her suitors, was a man of the world. In his love affair the great obstacle was John Morris. Morris was a big-hearted fellow.

Richard went to New York where his exceptional capabilities enabled him to arise to an excellent position with a manufacturing concern. His success, however, brought him but little real happiness. His heart was back in the little village with the girl he had left behind him.

John had not been successful. The factory where he was employed closed, and his hopes of marrying were shattered. Richard now saw his chance. By securing John a place in his firm he removed his rival from the eyes of the girl.

John assumed his new duties and Richard offered him the hand of friendship. One evening while dining at a fashionable cafe, Richard introduced John to La Sylph, a cabaret dancer. John, momentarily forgetful of his betrothed, became infatuated with the performer.

At the office Richard intercepted Hope's letter telling the breach. He took a photograph of the unsuspecting John with his arms about La Sylph. Then he paid a visit to his home town and showed the faithful one the picture. It only awakened her jealousy. She spurned Richard's repeated vows of love, and determined to go to the city, find out the real truth about her lover, and save him from himself.

Neglect of business caused Richard to lose his position. John was advanced to the vacant place.

The unemployed lover accidentally met the girl on her visit. He plotted to completely undo John. He telephoned his rival saying that La Sylph was very ill and had sent for him. John received the messaage as he was leaving the office with money to meet the factory payroll. He decided to stop but a moment at the dancer's apartments, then to go on with his work. When La Sylph saw him she was overjoyed, but denied having sent for him, and begged him to bear her company for a few moments.

Richard in the meantime escorts the weeping Hope to the actress' apartment, and unseen by John or Sylph he noiselessly opened the door and showed Hope her lover in the woman's arms.

On the way out Richard recognized the payroll satchel, opened it and stole the money.

Hope did not know what to do. Richard showed her the money and begged her to flee with him. She refused; but he felt confident that his evil work would have the desired effact so told her that if she changed her mind, he telegraph to Albany, where the message would reach him on the Montreal Express, and he would wait for her.

When John was ready to leave La Sylph he discovered the theft, and accused the dancer. He rushed out, only to be confronted by his faithful sweetheart, lurking in the hallway. She upbraided him. He begged for forgiveness. Hope remembered that Richard had a large amount of money in his possession, and she suddenly rushed away from John and telegraphed Richard to wait for her at Albany, resolving to get the money back and save her penitent fiance. John surprised by her action, followed her.

At Albany the rejected lover took her away in an automobile, closely pursued by the now jealous John. As John's machine overtook his rival's he leaped from one to the other while both were at full speed. A struggle took place. Richard escaped and slid down the steep side of a precipice on a rope; John followed closely. Both fell, Richard being seriously injured, while John landed safely. He found the missing money in the pockets of his prostrate rival.

Forgiving the wrongs he had suffered at Richard's hands, he carried him back to the automobile, and sent him to a hospital. John and Hope were happily married, and after the wedding was over they received a telegram from Richard, wishing them happiness and asking pardon for the past.

THE BATTLING BRITISH (B. & C.—Three Parts).—A hundred years ago England was complete mistress of the seas. Napoleon had subdued the nations of the continent with his vast armies. Combining the French and the Spanish fleets, he now turned his energies on England. To meet these hostile preparations England was making powerful efforts to man her fleets.

William Lorman, a young Englishman, lived happily with his wife, Susan, in their little cottage when the first news of the threatened invasion was received. Hatchet, a ne'er-do-well, was violently in love with Susan. William was detailed to serve on Admiral Lord Nelson's flagship, the "Victory."

One of his first acts was the saving of Captain Crosstree's life, while the English were attacking a French man-o'-war. In gratitude for this act the captain, at William's request, asked the admiralty for the latter's discharge. Shortly after this Admiral Nelson sighted the combined French and Spanish fleet. For hours the battle of Trafalgar raged.

In dense clouds of sulphurous smoke with death on every side William served his gun. Amid the din and roar he saw the French battleship "Redoubtable" approaching.

The enemy's ship came closer. William saw a rifleman lean far over the side of the masthead and fire. A second later a cry arose from the "Victory's" deck. Turning about, he saw Lord Nelson fall mortally wounded into the arms of his officers. William leaped to the deck of the "Redoubtable," fought his way to the mast, and climbed to the fighting top.

In a desperate hand-to-hand struggle he slew the sharpshooter and avenged the English admiral's death. The French were defeated, and Napoleon's dream of the mastery of the sea was shattered forever.

William reached his cottage just as the villainous Hatchet was telling Susan that he was dead, hoping by those means to gain her hand. He drove Hatchet from the house after giving him a thrashing.

William had not been home long when he was called to arms again. The sailors said sad farewell to their wives and sweethearts, and then marched aboard their ships. William had forgotten a bundle and returned at the inn in haste to get it. As he approached he saw a woman struggling to free herself from the arms of an intoxicated English officer.

The woman was his wife and the man his friend and captain, Crosstree. He gave the captain a stunning blow with the flat of his cutlass, seriously injuring him. William was placed under arrest, taken to his ship, tried and condemned to be hung at the yard-arm at noon. The stricken captain was placed in Susan's care.

In the meantime William's discharge was granted, but Hatchet and an accomplice robbed the mail carrier and intercepted the discharge papers. The exultant Hatchet hastened to Susan's home to flaunt the discharge in the face of William's wife, but the wounded captain, pointing a pistol at him, made him give up the papers.

The officer then instructed Susan to put on his uniform, and in that disguise board the ship with the papers and save her husband.

She jumped into a fisherman's boat and pulled with all her strength for the man-o'-war, closely pursued by Hatchet. Seeing that he was gaining on her she leaped into the water. The black flag, announcing her husband's doom, was slowly mounting to the top of the mast as Susan was pulled up the side of the ship.

Dripping wet she dashed to the middle of the quarter dack and waved the precious documents in the air. The man-o'-war's man was saved by a woman's heroism.

THE BRAND OF BARS (W. S. Film Corp.—Three Parts).—Tom Logan was nearing the close of his prison term. The jail door opened and closed on him—this time he was on the outside—a free man. He started out to secure employment, but at every hand he was rebuffed and turned away. He drifted West.

He was given work on a ranch, and soon by honest, intelligent service was promoted to be foreman. From the first meeting between Rose, the ranchman's daughter, and Tom, there had existed a sentiment of mutual interest which ere long developed into love. But the barrier of his past forbade him to speak of love to Rose, until he had laid the secret of his life before her father.

At this time Red Conway, who had been confined in the same prison as Tom, escaped. After killing a man in a gambling house he fled West and sought work at the very ranch of which Tom now had charge.

Tom, not recognizing his former fellow-convict, hired him. Soon afterward Tom, unexpectedly entering a room of the ranch house, surprised Red in the act of stealing money from the ranchman's desk.

The foreman snatched the money from the robber's hands and was about to give the alarm when the thief turned upon him and threatened him with exposure. While Tom hesitated his employer and Rose suddenly entered. Red at once pointed to the green bills in the foreman's hands. Deaf to all words of explanation from the accused foreman, the men made him a prisoner in a hut, with Red Conway as his jailer.

Late that afternoon cowboys from all the neighboring ranches for miles around assembled at the ranch house to hold a dance. Rose, who felt too badly over the evident downfall of her lover to take part in the merrymaking, started to visit some friends a few miles across the plain. But she turned back, determining not to forsake Tom in his hour of need. She was captured by a band of Indians.

Tom from his prison window saw the treacherous savages stealthily approaching the rancher's house. Battering down the door, he gave the alarm to the dancing cowpunchers. They seized their arms and rushed out. After a sharp battle the redskins retreated, hotly pursued by the ranchman for several miles. As Tom turned his horse to return, he saw Rose's hat at the side of the trail. Realizing that she had fallen into the hands of the redskins he started single-handed to rescue her.

After a frantic search he discovered the dusky marauders' encampment, at the foot of a steep cliff he saw his sweetheart a prisoner. Attracting her attention he lowered a rope. Rose was about to fasten herself to it, when Dawn, an Indian girl whom Tom had befriended and who was in love with him, pushed the white girl aside, and was hauled upward in her stead. Tom spurned the Indian maiden's plea of love.

Peering again he saw the red fiends tying the rancher's daughter to a stake to burn her alive. He was almost in despair, when he saw the boys from his own ranch and a squadron of cavalry approaching. Hastily telling them of the girl's deadly plight, the combined forces sounded the charge.

The Indians were taken completely by surprise by the onrushing horsemen. Tom saved Rose just as the flames were leaping upward about her. Red Conway had received his death-wound, but before he died he confessed that it was he who had tried to steal the money. Tom, fully vindicated, was restored to his former position, and the rancher gave him the hand of his daughter as a reward for bravery and faithful service.

WHEN WE WERE YOUNG (Miller Bros. 101 Ranch Three Parts).—The bright sun shone down on the head of an old man and a white-haired woman as they stood on the bank of the Osage River, their gaze riveted on Beecher Island in the middle of the stream.

The scene brought back to the old couple visions of the stirring days when the little island was strewn with dead, and the river, as it flowed onward, was stained with the blood of paleface and redskin. And as they looked the story of their youth unfolded before the eyes of memory. Here is the story:

Dan Cooper, like many another young fellow, could not resist the call of the wanderlust. As he cantered leisurely across the prairie, he saw a solitary soldier riding for dear life, with a troop of yelling redskins close behind him. Dan galloped to the fleeing man's side. The soldier was a young officer of the regular army. Together they put up a stiff fight, and drove the Indians off. The young officer was severely wounded, and asked Dan to assist him back to Fort Leavensworth. Here the young officer introduced the new-found friend to his sister Anna. For a week Dan was the happiest fellow that ever lived, but was too full of life to keep out of trouble.

One day he saw a drunken halfbreed beating a young and pretty squaw. He knocked the halfbreed down, and won the squaw's gratitude. As he rode away, he discovered that his quirt was missing.

The next day a traveler was found robbed and murdered by the roadside, and across his body lay Dan's quirt. He was accused of the crime, and Anna's father, the commander of the fort, gave orders for his arrest. Dan made his getaway before he was caught, and joined a party of miners who were on their way to the California gold fields. Anna believed that her lover was guilty, and was heartbroken.

At this time old chief Roman Nose was at the height of his power. The mining party was attacked, and put up a hard fight, until their ammunition gave out. Things were looking serious, and Dan and the miners were preparing to die. The redskins were nearly upon them when they suddenly heard a bugle blast. The Indians turned to fight the newcomers, but were driven back by the cavalry, leaving their dead and wounded behind them. The party was saved by a heavily escorted government train.

At this time Colonel Forsythe received notice to punish Roman Nose, and drive the Indians still further West. His troops started on the search of the enemy, and on the way were joined by Dan and the miners. After severe fighting, the white men were driven back to Beecher Island, and for seven days they repelled the repeated attacks of the redskins.

Colonel Forsythe's losses were very severe, and on the seventh day only fourteen men remained alive under him. Their only hope lay in getting word to the commander at Fort Leavensworth to send reinforcements. Dan volunteered to execute the perilous mission. Under cover of the darkness he stole through the Indians' lines, which now completely surrounded the island, and for two days and nights, without food or drink, with breathless haste he traveled on foot toward the fort. There he fell overcome with hunger and weakness. Two troopers discovered and revived him. To them he told of Colonel Forsythe's plight. One galloped back and gave the alarm. In a short time the five squadrons of cavalry thundered across the plains. They fought for hours without driving the redskins back. Old Roman Nose led a picked body of horsemen in a desperate charge. A sharpshooter sent a bullet into his heart. At his death the Indians fled.

In the meanwhile Dan was brought to the fort, his heart beating with joy at the prospect of seeing Anna once again. The father was about to place him under arrest when Fawn, the Indian girl, whom he had protected from the halfbreed, rushed to his side and, pointing to the halfbreed, said:

"He killed the man and placed Dan's quirt there. I saw him do it." Dan was saved, and his happiness was complete when Anna threw herself into his arms and sobbed for joy.

TEMPTATION (Kinematograff — Three Parts).—Jack Newton, a young country inventor, just completed his working model of a new type of torpedo, which could be controlled and directed as it sped onward on its errand of death. On the day that the final laboratory tests were made the inventor received two visits. The first was from an acquaintance, James Thorne, who seemed to be strangely interested in the invention.

The other visitor was Lucy Marlow, Jack's sweetheart. He was so engrossed in his work, however, that he paid but scant attention to her. In anger she left his shop, and as she returned to her father's farmhouse, she decided to leave Jack and her aged parents and go to the city in answer to an advertisement which held out an alluring promise to young girls of big pay for refined work.

As Lucy was speeding toward the great metropolis, Jack sat in an armchair in his workshop sleeping. He awoke with a start and saw a dark figure trying to pry open the box in which he had locked the torpedo.

He grappled with the intruder. In the struggle Jack fell wounded by a revolver shot. As he lay helpless on the floor he saw his assailant escaping through a window. It was Thorne.

The next day Jack received a request from the Navy Department to demonstrate his model before a board of experts. Not wishing to allow the results of his long research to leave his sight he removed the secret mechanism and sent the empty shell of the torpedo by freight. Through his spies Thorne learned of the proposed shipment of the torpedo, and he and a number of desperate accomplices held up the train and seized the crate, only to find the secret mechanism missing.

Lucy in the meantime arrived in the city, only to learn that the advertisement that lured her there was fraudulent, a decoy placed by evil persons. With temptation on every side she searched in vain for honest employment. At last, penniless and in despair, she wrote to Jack, begging forgiveness and urging him to come and take her home.

On her way to mail the letter she fell unconscious to the pavement from hunger and weakness. Thorne, who was passing, recognized the girl, and carried her to a tenement where his chief lieutenant lived, locked her in a room, and held her as the magnet which would attract the young inventor into his power. Thorne changed the address which Lucy asked Jack to come to, mailed the letter, and waited.

Two days later Jack, hastening to Lucy's aid, fell into the hands of Thorne and his desperadoes. Here they hung their prisoner by his wrists to the roof beams. Thorne threatened to blow him into eternity with a powerful bomb unless he divulged the secret construction of the torpedo. Jack refused. Lucy, a prisoner, overheard the conspirators and learned of Jack's plight. Making a rope of her bed clothes, she lowered herself out of a window. Then she notified the police.

Thorne entered her room only to find it empty. Dashing pellmell to the river the conspirators scrambled into a motor boat, and sped away toward Jack's prison under a hail of bullets from the police, who also seized a motor boat and started in pursuit.

Lucy was the first to arrive at the hut. Fortunately the man left to guard the place was not in sight, so she bounded into the hut and freed her sweetheart. Before they could escape, however, the guard returned and gave battle. Jack fought his way to freedom just as Thorne, who had outdistanced the police, leaped from his boat on the shore and ran to the house.

Thorne was in a towering rage when he found that Jack had escaped and turned upon the guard. With a stunning blow, he sent the latter staggering to the ground and then shot him. The old fellow, realizing that his end was near, determined that he would not die alone.

He clutched the bomb. With eyes glittering with hatred he scrambled to his feet, and before the horrified gangsters could interpose dashed the bomb to the earth. The explosion wiped out the gang. That night Jack restored the girl to her grief-stricken father. Shortly after this the government bought the invention for a large sum. He returned to the village a rich and famous man to claim Lucy as his bride.

IT'S ALL IN THE LENS

The Light Which Does Not Interfere With Projection

The day of the dark theatre has passed. This is due primarily to the perfection of the EYE COMFORT LIGHTING System. This system is neither an imitation nor a substitute. It is based on fundamental principles discovered by us and proven by long practice to be absolutely correct. It is the original indirect lighting.

Indirect Light does not interfere with the clearness of the picture. It has no glare, does not distract attention or cause headaches.

It lights the house evenly. It relieves eyestrain.

The Eye Comfort Lighting System

is so good and so successful that it is imitated. But these imitations, which are offered you because they are "cheap," lack the powerful one-piece silvered mirror X-RAY EYE COMFORT reflectors which control and direct the light by their scientific design and evenly light the house. These are the most powerful reflectors made and require less current than any others.

Fill in the blank below and allow our engineers to lay out a plan for lighting your theatre. This won't cost you a cent and does not obligate you in any way. But it will tell you exactly how much EYE COMFORT LIGHTING for your theatre would cost.

"Nearly three years' operation with the same tube"

Alexandria, La.

"Regarding the operation of the Mercury Arc Rectifier installed in the Pass Time Theatre, would advise--that the same has been very satisfactory indeed, having cut my bill approximately forty per cent., at the same time producing a much better picture than that formerly obtained by use of an auto-transformer.

"It might also be of interest to you to learn that the tube which we are now using has been in operation daily (seven hours per day) for two years and nine months and appears to be better today than when first installed."

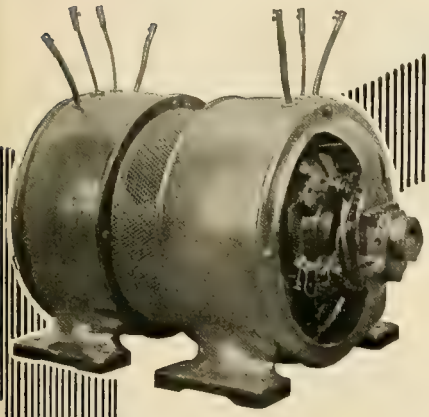
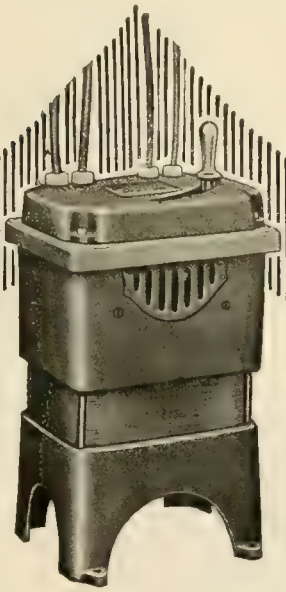
BETTER LIGHT

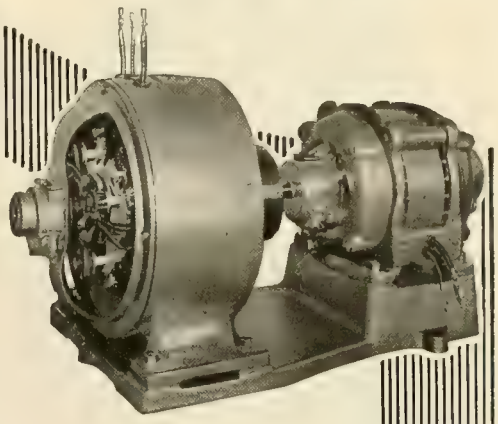
LESS CURRENT



The DC Compensarc lowers the voltage of a direct current supply to that required at the lamp without needless waste.



The AC Compensarc cuts ⅔ from your lighting bill if you use alternating current.



The AC to DC Compensarc will transform alternating into direct current and reduce the voltage at the same time without needless waste.

No matter what current you have---Alternating or Direct---or what voltage or frequency, one of the will enable you to secure a light that will give those clear, bright pictures that everybody now demands.

What's the use of paying extra money for special screens, projecting machines, and first run films and then spoil the whole result with poor light? With the Fort Wayne Compensarcs you can get any kind of light you want regardless of the kind or quality of your current supply.

The Compensarcs will give you

STEADY LIGHT. No flickering, no sputtering, even when changing intensities or from one machine to another.

WHITE LIGHT. No yellow streaks, no ghosts.

BRIGHT LIGHT. Three times the light with two-thirds the current.

They are safe, efficient, easy to operate, fool proof and reliable.

C-5

Compensarcs are so commonly found in motion picture theatres that many people now call all current saving and transforming devices by that name.

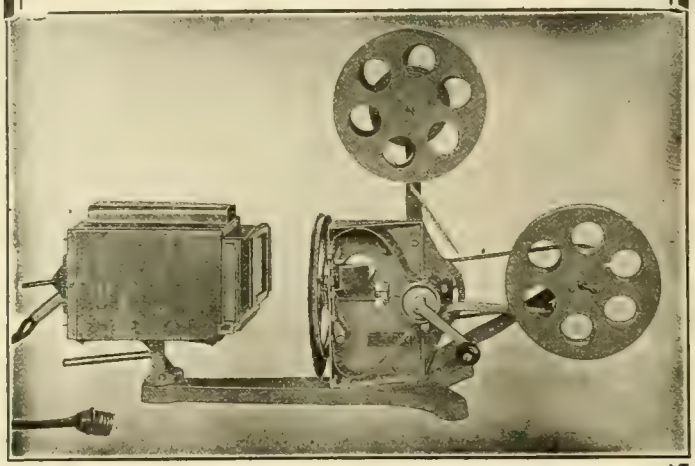
Phantoscope

and the wonderful acquaintance-sale offer we are making



What the Phantoscope is

THE Phantoscope projects motion pictures from standard motion picture films obtained from any film agency in any city the world over; it projects an 8-foot picture; it takes its light from ordinary electric sockets, using either current, or can be run equally well by special gas generators. The film may be stopped anywhere to be examined and studied. It also projects magic lantern slides, enhancing its utility where one picture is as important as a moving film. As a stereopticon it equals the most expensive apparatus. It is thus really three machines in one.

How easily it works

THE Phantoscope's simplicity and dependability have been proved by 225 educational, religious and commercial institutions where it is now in daily use. It can be set up in two minutes, and operated by a boy of ten or twelve. Easy to carry—weighs but 20 pounds in its case.

WE POSITIVELY GUARANTEE the materials and workmanship of the Phantoscope and hereby unhesitatingly agree to replace within one year any parts found to be defective.

Introductory offer

WE have decided to sell the next 500 Phantoscopes at $75 apiece, instead of the regular price of $100. This is complete, with carrying case, attaching cord, screen on which to project the picture and a box of carbons. We commit ourselves to this special offer only as long as these 500 specially priced machines last. We expect this offer to be eagerly seized by the public. Act at once if you don't want to be disappointed.

Send us your check, money order or draft for $75, and your Phantoscope will be shipped to you at once, under the broad guarantee mentioned above.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY

Story by Harold MacGrath Scenario by Lloyd Lonergan

Episode No. 18 of The Million Dollar Mystery has just been released. It contains new thrills—new action—and is keenly interesting. It puts another wedge in the tremendous popularity of this picture. All 18 episodes are now available for bookings.

$10,000.00 will be paid for the best 100-word solution of the mystery. 300 leading newspapers are now running this story. Exhibitors may arrange bookings by applying at once to

The Thanhouser Three-a-Week

Tuesday, October 20th, "Old Jackson's Girl"

This is a two-reel Western drama that throbs with emotion—excitement. It depicts an episode from the life of Jim Jackson—a suspected horse thief—whose daughter is in love with a young ranchman. The thrills which are exhibited before the young couple are finally united, make this an exceptionally interesting photo-play. Note this excellent cast: Dave Thompson, Mayre Hall, Morris Foster, Justus D. Barnes, Clare Kroell E. Sherwood and Jack Sullivan.

Sunday, October 25th, "Mr. Cinderella"

A beautiful playlet based on the fairy tale idea. How little Jimmie—the poor, pitied boy—is given an opportunity by his fairy godfather to visit the county fair and meet the Queen of the Popcorn Trust and enjoy himself immensely, is an interesting film story. The cast includes Nolan Gane, Fan Bourke, E. Turner, J. Myers, Dave Thompson and Mildred Hellar.

Phenomenal Growth

Oklahoma!

—There are about 250 theatres in this territory. We haven't the exact figures. Of this number 150 are using Universal service !
—That's SIXTY PER CENT OF THE WHOLE WORKS !
—One year ago the Universal program had a hard row to hoe in Oklahoma. It was unknown in many places. Today there are not over ten towns in the entire state in which we are not represented. Incidentally the majority of our competitors' customers are LOCATED IN TOWNS WHERE WE ALREADY HAVE A CUSTOMER AND THEREFORE CANNOT SUPPLY TWO ACCOUNTS IN ONE PLACE !

(Use the brains God gave you !)

Texas!

—There are 500 moving picture theatres in Texas. Of this number over two hundred use the Universal program REGULARLY. We refer to the reliable houses, not those that open and close and change ownership every ten minutes.
—This means 40 per cent are Universalites ! Think of it !
—In Fort Worth we serve four out of twelve. In Houston four out of twelve. In San Antonio five out of eleven. In Dallas nine out of twenty-four.
—All this in the face of competition from the other regular program services offered and innumerable "feature" film exchanges which are opening and closing every time the clock ticks.

Indianapolis!

—In the city of Indianapolis there are seventy theatres. Of this number TWENTY-FIVE are using the Universal service !
—Over 35 per cent of the entire business is done by the Universal in the hotbed of competition created by the various groups of exchanges and innumerable "State Right feature" exchanges.
—This is a big percentage of the total business but it is going to be even bigger ! With nearly all other companies retrenching to make up for European losses, the Universal is taking the opposite tack and spreading out constantly. The exhibitors are bound to see the result on the screen. The minute they do our 35 per cent in this territory will jump !

(Use the brains God gave you !)

Calgary!

—In the city of Calgary there are 7 picture theatres. We are supplying THREE of these. That's nearly FIFTY PER CENT !
—In the Alberta territory there are 76 theatres. And the Universal is serving 37. Again, NEARLY HALF !
—And the manager of the Universal exchange in this district calmly remarks that "taking everything into consideration HALF is no more than our share as the Universal service certainly warrants 50 per cent of the business IN ANY TERRITORY."
—We agree with him. And so will YOU, Mr. Exhibitor, if you will take the time and trouble to study the Universal program for even so short a time as one week !

The Master Key!

John Fleming Wilson's Grand Successor to "Trey O' Hearts"

—Again Universal offers a serial that will bring the people in flocks and send them out boosting Universal, boosting the picture and boosting YOU for your foresight in booking it. John Fleming Wilson, the popular novelist, is writing it; the leading American newspapers are printing it: their millions of readers are going to clamor and fight to see it.

—And its stars are Robert Leonard and Ella Hall, of Rex Fame!

—A MAIN PURPOSE OF "THE MASTER KEY"—that's its mystic name—is to prove to amazed Universal exhibitors THAT WE DID NOT UTILIZE EVERY POSSIBILITY FOR REALISM in producing "The Trey O' Hearts," which has been the foolish conclusion of many theatre men who have witnessed that succession of feats and thrills. "The Master Key" will make you think that in "Trey O' Hearts" we only BEGAN to be realistic!

—"The Master Key" (by John Fleming Wilson, and with Robert Leonard and Ella Hall) starts when "Trey O' Hearts" stops, and appears in weekly episodes of two reels each, for a period of fifteen weeks. Use the brains God gave you, stop paying outrageous prices for serials not half as good, and book the wonder-serial that lets you keep some of the profits of the day you show it!

—A Mary Fuller Witch Girl! An elf of the hills who frolics up to you and whom, when you put out your arms to gather her in, disappears into the wilds from whence she came. Can you imagine the wondrous posters we're going to get out for that kind of a Mary Fuller? Better order this marvelous "paper" now, to give the picture plenty of advance publicity.

—Talking of "paper," wonder if that could be one of the reasons we are doing more business everywhere than any other program? Anyway, it's a fact we're the only program on earth that has a staff of men who create poster ideas and do nothing else.

What the Springfield, Ill., News says of "The Plum Tree," the first of Essanay's prize mystery dramas:

"In 'The Plum Tree,' one of the most popular features that has ever struck Springfield, Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne, the most popular team in moving pictures, are featured. The play is a clean, clear-cut drama all the way through, not of the blood and thunder or ridiculous sort, but plain, and related to everyday life. There is not a ridiculous movement or situation in the entire three reels, and not a tremor in the acting. It might be pronounced perfect. There is an appealing situation throughout."

"The Ragged Earl"

Popular Plays and Players Company Picturize Andrew Mack in His Famous Comedy-Drama.

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S.T.B.

FOR clean, pure comedy-drama, of the highest educational character we have seen nothing to compare with "The Ragged Earl" as made by Lubin for the Popular Plays and Players Company. It represents a type of photodrama that for the past five years we have been trying to convince manufacturers, directors and photoplaywrights is not only the kind that the American people want, but is also the kind that will increase the bank account of all concerned. It is a typical example of educational comedy or of "pure food" as compared with the "adulterated candy" entertainment that is so common nowadays. Give us more of it.

As to the acting, Andrew Mack, who plays his old role of Gerald Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, the ragged earl, has achieved as great, if not greater, success before the eye of the camera as he did formerly in the eyes of thousands of legitimate theatergoers, and he is most ably supported by the cast with which Lubin has supplied him. William Conklin as Sir Henry Hardcastle is excellent; Edward J. Peil as Lord Wildbrook, the old roue who wishes to marry Kathleen, is inimitable and Ormi Hawley and Eleanor Dunn as the two stepchildren of Sir Henry are simply superb. So also is the actress whose name should have been listed in the cast who played the part of Lady Hardcastle.

Another thing deserving comment is the settings and locations. The interiors are not only in keeping with the character of the story, but they also coincide with the exteriors, a point that is apparently almost always, to judge from what we see, overlooked or paid little attention to by nearly every director. Fairmount Park, the Wisahickon Drive, and the Lancaster Turnpike offer some of the most beautiful exteriors that can be found anywhere in the world and, judging from the locations, we recognized in the picture these and similar localities have been utilized for all they are worth by a director who had a discerning mind.

"THE NIGHTINGALE"

Drama in Five Reels, Written by Augustus Thomas. Produced by the All-Star Feature Corporation.

The delicate art of building a play around a player has been practised with varying success by a sufficient number of dramatists, though not, in recent years at least, by Augustus Thomas. As a playwright, he has given every indication of believing that the play comes first and that the players are there to give it expression; but as a photo-playwright, he is willing to reverse the order. Evidently the determined purpose of the All-Star Company was to find a story in which Ethel Barrymore had every opportunity, and Mr. Thomas set himself the task of devising such a story in preference to adapting a play that was essentially of and for the stage. Altogether, a wise move, for "Mid-Channel," "Tank," or any one of the subtle dramas acted by Miss Barrymore, probably would have made a sorry showing on the screen. As it is, audiences will find a stage star meeting motion picture actresses on their own ground, so to speak, and giving a beautiful performance in a quite typical photoplay story.

It is a good one, in that it affords Miss Barrymore a wide scope and permits a variety of moods seldom attainable in a strict adaptation of a play kept consistently in one key and progressing along the lines of a definite theme. Few actresses have had equal opportunities to do themselves justice when facing the camera for the first time; so it is only fair to say that Mr. Thomas achieved something well worth doing when he wrote "The Nightingale." Taking a good picture is a natural quality very much in Miss Barrymore's favor, but her playing of Isola Franti is much more than a series of pretty posturings. She shows an exceptional aptitude for making her meaning clear and giving the ring of truth to a character. Isola is an Italian girl, and whether in good fortune or ill, clothed in calico or silk, Miss Barrymore preserves the same little oddities of manner that are as thoroughly a part of the character's individuality as is physical appearence.

JUDGE NOT

In Four Parts

Sprawled out upon the sidewalk with his hat and stick beside him lies Judge Martin, victim of foul play!

It's the opening scene, the first of a series of baffling, swift-moving incidents in a story conspicuous for dramatic situations and rapid action.

The Prosecuting Attorney, his dearest friend, starts vigorously after the murderer. The second reel takes you back to events occurring two weeks before the Judge's death. And then surely and swiftly the brilliant mind of the prosecutor, actuated by double motives of duty and vengeance, weaves a chain of evidence about two innocent parties, almost irrefutable in its strength!

How a scientist untangles the skeins of destiny—proves the energetic prosecutor subject to spells of momentary insanity and guilty of the crime—are story elements both unusual and powerful.

THE GOLDEN BEETLE

In Four Parts

Four reels of film, that will delight the man who likes sensational pictures!

A story of dual personality charged with adventure in the Jungles of India, on the High Seas, and in the Ruins of an East Indian Temple.

Surrey's rescue from the savages; his desperate flight; his battle with a Lion; his message for help tied to the wings of a ferocious eagle, are but few of many exciting exploits of a story bristling with action!

"The Golden Beetle," is a box-office magnet of extraordinary possibilities. Following the thread of adventure, runs a pretty love story of universal appeal. You will like "The Golden Beetle"—so will your patrons.

EDISON

THE MIDNIGHT RIDE OF PAUL REVERE

Retold after the famous poem by HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

Of all the characters of our Revolutionary period, none is more endeared to young and old than that of Paul Revere, whose exploit has been immortalized by Longfellow so effectively that the lines of the poem and the incidents portrayed are graven more deeply, perhaps, upon the average American mind than any other character or exploit of our American history.

The action throughout this film is finely sustained and many of the scenes, including Revere's house, that of Hancock, the wall at Lexington, where the first shots were fired, were all taken on the exact historical spots where the original action took place.

This is a film that will stir the hearts and minds of young and old and should be met with a tremendous welcome throughout the entire country.

Facts and Comments

IT is remarkable how the antiquated institutions resent the intrusion of the motion picture. That highly dignified body known as the Senate of the United States was recently thrown into convulsions of horror when a cameraman unlimbered his artillery and began to film the distinguished wearers of the toga. There was a hot protest and some trouble to place the responsibility for the cameraman's presence in the sacred chamber. The Vice-President of the United States, who was at first held responsible, claimed to have been misunderstood and the end of it was an order for the destruction of such pictures as had been taken. Just why the senate should object to be seen in motion pictures we cannot understand. The senate chamber is part of the object of many political and sight-seeing tourists to the national capital and if there is nothing sacrilegious in gazing upon the persona propria of a United States senator there can be no harm in contemplating him as he moves upon the screen. In fact we think that motion pictures of the machinery of government in Washington might well form the most important part in any course of civics.

WHEREVER the motion picture comes into favor as a factor in education the credit has to be given in some measure at least to the exhibitors of the locality. In Louisville, we are informed by a friend and reader, the Board of Education has gone on record as favoring motion pictures for educational purposes. The Parent-Teacher League of that city is responsible for the movement to utilize motion pictures for the special benefit of children. A splendid program was selected and presented at one of the local theatres. The program consisted of "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," "Three Bears," a comical fairy tale; "How Washington Crossed the Delaware," and "Little Billy's Triumph." The performance was highly successful and similar programs will be presented regularly. Thus it is expected a way will be paved for the final introduction of complete kinematographic courses in the schools of Louisville. In most places the exhibitors themselves are responsible for the degree of favor enjoyed by the motion pictures in their particular town or city.

WE are loath to believe that the labor unions are in any way identified with or even approve of the unfair, not to say criminal, methods of which motion picture proprietors have been the victims in Chicago and elsewhere. Disputes with organized labor are bound to arise occasionally. The only decent way of settling them is by compromise or arbitration. To throw foul-smelling substances into a crowded theatre because the owner cannot come to an understanding with his employees or with the men who had been engaged to build his theatre is a kind of warfare which is to be condemned on all accounts. With men who fight with such weapons no compromise is possible. They must be dealt with as criminals. The labor unions owe it to themselves to publicly disclaim any connection or sympathy with such outrages.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has within the past week been compelled to refuse advertising intended to give publicity to highly objectionable pictures; so-called features which offend the sense of common decency, generally to be found in the moral make-up of every sound and normal human being. If our readers therefore find no mention of these films in either the advertising pages or in the reviews they will know the reason why. One of the "features" is frankly erotic not to say pornographic—just plain filth. The other production is heralded as a "film with a lesson." It purports to show the effects of an hereditary taint. The details of this latter abortion are particularly revolting and there is good ground for the hope that the police will be able to deal with it as it seems to constitute in the legal sense of the term "an indecent exhibition."

We have at all times stood for the clean film and what we think of prurient pictures is well expressed in the article of a clergyman contributor which will be found in another part of this issue. We take this stand with the fullest approval of the best elements in the industry. One of these nasty films can do infinite harm to all the producers, distributors and exhibitors. But for these detestable films there never would have been any demand for legal censorship. We cannot help feeling that to take money for making such abhorrent productions known to the public is a species of treason to the entire motion picture industry. We would just as soon think of taking money for spreading the germs of disease. American producers have so far been singularly free from the reproach of making these abominable pictures. The unwelcome exceptions will, we hope, be properly dealt with by every exhibitor to whom they may be offered.

Why Some Features Fail

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

NOTHING is harder to reform or inspire with fresh aims than antiquated schemes of production, whether the medium be that of the stage or of the screen. Ideals that have been long materialized become academic and unchanging. Even men who assume the roles of instructor become conservative from habit and sentiment and advocate the system in which they have been trained, and their pupils, in consequence, turn out plays that have little in them of brilliant originality. The talented Professor of Dramatic Literature in Columbia University confines a large part of his attention to what has been done, meanwhile formulating theories of what should be done according to the special characteristics of art in past ages, though he acknowledges that what is presented on the stage may depart from its own limitations without loss of force.

"One art there is," he admits, "which can at one and the same time tell a story, and give an impression of the visible world, and fill our eyes with the beauty of form, and charm our ears with rhythm and harmony. The one art is the art of the drama." He continues later, "To some of us it seems like an arrant absurdity that pupils should be forced to scan the pathetic passages of Sophocles or to parse the swift repartees of Shakespeare before they are made to see clearly that the tragedies of the Greek and the romantic comedies of the English are great as they are because of their admirable dramaturgic structure." Professor Mathews would have us study those playwrights who arrived at their mastery of craft without any such study. This is the way of pedantry. The Professor's display of learning is very interesting at times, but his advice is that of the schoolmaster occupied with details.

More than one instance has been known of men who could write fluently on the drama, who could not write a play if their lives depended on it, but some of these gentlemen overlook broad general principles in their earnest investigation of trifles. Original work of high value, such as Mr. Mathews commends among the masters, results from new thoughts, from uncommon combination of thought, from creators of distinct intellectual individuality. That such writers were like no one else, that they gave to the world ideas that were fresh, new and striking, was the essence of their genius. The creative author's impulses are to create. He prefers that work to any form of transcription, and it is in his character not to model himself and his work upon some old master, to see with eyes long closed, that looked out upon a world much different from that in which we are living.

It has been hoped by those who have the future of moving pictures near at heart that they would not fall into theatrical ruts of conventionality, where all that is false and artificial has long been accepted as compensation for a loss of truth and naturalness. To depend now upon transcriptions of stage plays, however interesting in themselves, is to imperil originality of motion-picture production. Authors who have some insight into the principles and methods of screen visualization take up such work when it is made profitable to them to do so, but they rarely succeed without incorporating much that is new. They put a keener edge on a blade that has ceased to cut because it is worn out, and, in this way, may revitalize many an old derelict, but the fresh material, rather than the old, is what makes such structures available for screen presentation. Such employment may be a good schooling for writers who are to eventually provide us with the best photodramas, but it is a hard training.

To begin with, the actual material in a stage play is usually scant. A large part of its presentation has been occupied with conversation, witty or otherwise, principally otherwise. Stripped of its verbiage, the average play can be easily shown on the screen in one reel. Others may fill two reels, but amplification begins then in nearly all cases. Now the enlargement and extension to five reels is too often that of stretching a rubber band. The process of stretching results in a thinning of interest to a point of emaciation. Subtitles of no particular import are over-exposed—one can read them down and up again several times. So-called "continuity" scenes are introduced, people passing in and out of houses, putting on coats and hats, driving from one point to another in motor cars, police-station officials listening at the 'phone, and a great deal that wearies the audience, instead of sustaining attention. Such methods weaken what needs added strength to hold an audience.

It is not reasonable to expect an audience to travel five reels with only nutriment enough for one or two. Who is to provide sustaining pabulum for the other three unless it be the one who transcribes, the scenario writer, and how can he be expected to revive the old carcass with new flesh and blood unless he has a surplus of his own at hand? Because there are authors who can formulate a five-reel production for the screen out of scant material for two reels makes it possible to revive many plays long pigeon-holed as mere script souvenirs. There are also would-be playwrights who feel a yearning, a very natural one at that, to transcribe some former stage success for screen production, but few features of importance have resulted from such praiseworthy impulses. The desire to write photo-plays is more common than the ability to furnish a coherent and striking story.

Not to discourage ambition so laudable, it might do for the aspirant to try himself out with a dozen or two one-reel scenarios, submitted in open competition for what they will bring. If any of them reach visualization, he will acquire a more accurate measure of his ability as a dramatist. If he can win and hold an audience with the smaller photoplay, no reason exists why he should not attempt the larger proposition. If he cannot qualify, it is not entirely reasonable for him to expect producers to risk thousands of dollars on his five-reel adaptations, for he will need abundant resource of imagination to furnish what they lack. This suggestion is for the benefit of insiders as well as outsiders. The mere fact that a man is connected with a feature producing concern does not argue his especial fitness as a scenario writer, strange as it may seem.

Not only is this an era of specialization, but the making of a big feature play requires the differentiation of several crafts. One man's distinctive occupation is that of providing structure. Another adorns with treatment, involving appropriate settings and interpretation. The interpreter, especially one of strong personality, is another important factor. When the visualization is negatively complete it is made positively so by a scientific department. These divisions of duty should be treated as such. The finished product is then made a profitable agent through the ability of those engaged in marketing it. The final screen projection is also a particular matter, but the main issue is that of specialization, without which the initial investment becomes a dangerous risk.

Prurient Pictures

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

BY FOUR years of hard fighting against the morbid and nasty picture, the American people have shown plainly that they have no sympathy with foreign moral or rather immoral standards and that they want clean, wholesome pictures that will appeal to a man's better self and will bring him more in touch with the good, the true, the beautiful. In every community, however, there are always individuals of a warped nature, poisoned mentality and seared moral force who not only delight in foulness and filthiness themselves, but are also willing for the sake of gain to pander to the depraved tastes and baser passions of others, even when it involves the corruption of innocence and the destruction of all that is pure and noble and holy. Consequently, no sooner have we begun to be successful in stemming the tide of frankly immoral pictures with which some manufacturers have endeavored to flood the market than we are confronted with the same kind of pictures in the guise of "moral preachers" who proclaim that their mission is "to save the innocent by exposing the evils with which they are surrounded," and the so-called vice and drug picture raises its snaky head.

Thanks to the clean-minded manufacturers and the National Board of Censorship, this sort of thing has been practically although not altogether eradicated from the ordinary programs, but one after another, during the past year, feature films of four, five and six or more reels have been put upon the market and extensively advertised professing to teach a great moral lesson by unmasking the grave dangers to which children and the young are exposed; and within the past ten days there have been exhibited three pictures, all of them revolting, and one of them absolutely disgusting and scandalous in its open advocacy of adultery and debauchery. This last picture excuses its appearance on the ground that it is the reproduction of a famous story and that it has been done in such a way as "to give offense to none." But essentially they are all of them in no way different from the mass of lewdness and corruption that several foreign manufacturers formerly tried to pour on the American market, and the very "refinement and delicacy and non-offensiveness" with which these latter claim to have treated their subjects only makes them the more harmful and vicious. As long as we can see the horns and cloven hoof and tail, we can recognize and shun the devil, but when he comes around disguised as an angel of light and the apostle of Christ, then he is dangerous because we may not recognize him until it is too late and the harm has been done. The more attractive a picture is and the more the offensive and revolting features and elements in it are removed and disguised, the greater is that picture's alluring appeal to our senses and imagination. If the underlying suggestion is evil, the appeal is evil and the only result is that the picture arouses evil passions that hitherto the spectator had been able to keep in check or that he was ignorant he possessed.

To write a story in which a Queen commits adultery simply because she wants an heir to the throne and her debauched husband cannot give her one, and then to try to give an air of piosity to the transaction by having the papal benediction bestowed on the result of the illegitimate union is not only sacrilege, but the most damnably devilish kind of immorality that one can conceive of. The more famous its author, the more refined and delicate its exposition, the greater should be its condemnation, because these things only add to its dangerousness to righteousness and purity and holiness and everything that makes life worth living and God more lovable.

There is absolutely no excuse possible for this kind of picture, but it may be argued with some apparent plausibility that the vice and drug and other pictures that are "exposes with a moral lesson" are very different and should not be classed with them. These latter claim to be produced and disseminated only for the purpose of warning people of the grave and serious dangers to their moral life with which they are surrounded and to be intended to help people to be able to recognize and escape these dangers. Even so, do they do anything more than give us a knowledge of the details, most of them revolting and disgusting, of the cancers and diseases that wreck and destroy the life of some persons. Not one of them teaches us how to escape them or how to get cured if we become a victim to them. All that they can do is to scare us into fits and panic over the imminency and awfulness of the things to be avoided and to deprive us of the power of sane reasoning and energetic action that will preserve us against the evil they expose. You cannot teach a child how to keep clean by showing him how he can get dirty, but you can put ideas into his head and make him want to see how dirty he can get without getting into trouble. You cannot teach anybody how to live a godly, sober and righteous life by showing him the many diñerent ways in which he can become vicious. You have got to show him what godliness, righteousness and sobriety mean and why they will make him better and happier and are desirable. In other words, if you wish to teach anybody anything, you do not do it by teaching him what the things are not and how he can get them, you do it by showing him what the things are and how he can get them. The most you can do with vice and drug pictures is to drive hysterical and nervous persons into hysteria and panic and to disgust stronger minded and saner natures.

At the bottom and in the last analysis, the "expose with a moral lesson" is no whit better or different from the frankly immoral picture. Both deal in vice as a subject and both show you how vice tries to make itself attractive. Neither of them emphasize the beauty of holiness or teach a man anything about how he can become better. They are not clean, uplifting wholesome pictures in any sense of the term, but unclean, leprous and abominable in every way, and unless some way of checking and preventing their exhibition is discovered they will do immeasurable injury to the picture business and incalculable harm to thousands of innocent persons who might have otherwise become happy individuals, good citizens or even saints of God. Their dissemination in the past has brought about all the evils of legal censorship, their continuation in the future will cause the forfeiture of all the respect and good will that the picture has only just won from the better and more intelligent classes of persons, and their mere existence is a standing menace not only to the picture business itself but to everything that makes for individual, civic and religious righteousness.

The American people have shown that they want only clean pictures. The decent and reputable manufacturers have proved that they want to produce only clean pictures. The entrance into the market of the filth and putridity that is being produced under specious arguments faces everyone in the business with a serious danger and grave responsibility. What are we going to do about it?

War Tax Fight Soon Ended

Schedule Submitted by the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America Expected to Pass Senate this Week—Graded Tax Will Mean Substantial Saving to Exhibitors Over Original Straight Rate of $100.

IT is expected that the United States Senate will this week pass the war tax bill and that there will be included in the measure the amendment to the House clause taxing theaters $100. The Senate amendment, as was pointed out in the Moving Picture World last week, is approximately that suggested by Fulton Brylawski, of Washington, secretary of the local branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. Instead of the flat rate of $100 on all houses, regardless of size or of the population of the town in which they may be situated, as was the provision when the bill came from the House of Representatives, the measure as it stands now imposes a tax of $25 on houses having a seating capacity of 300 or less, $50 on those containing from 300 to 600 seats, $75 for those between 600 and 1,000, and all others $100. Immediately after the Senate takes action the measure will be returned to the House, which will then appoint a committee of conference to meet a like committee on the part of the Senate and the real battle will be on.

Ligon Johnson, general counsel for the United Managers' Protective Association, which includes in its board of governors twelve of the most prominent motion picture manufacturers, said on Wednesday that his association had prepared a substitute for the report of the Senate Committee. This substitute will be presented to the conference committee of the two houses as the expression of the men engaged in theatrical production as well as on behalf of motion picture exhibitors.

"You will recall that our first fight was made on the basis that no tax whatever should be levied," said Mr. Johnson, "that the theaters (both regular and picture), ought to be classed as educational institutions, and that there was no more reason for taxing them than there was for taxing schools or newspapers and periodicals. We made great headway on this, but unfortunately the Senators were under the impression that exhibitors would be satisfied with the tax of $25, $50, $75 and $100, and the Senate committee jumped at this basis as a compromise.

"While we still believed that it was unfair to single out theaters and that no tax whatever should be levied on them, we realized, under the existing situation, a tax was certain and that the best we could do would be to get it to the lowest figure possible. We therefore are fighting now to have substituted for the Senate report another scale, graded and classified, and we believe it is far more than the theaters' just share of any tax that can with any propriety be levied, even though they are considered properly taxable.

"I don't wish to be considered as criticising those who have given their work and efforts for what they believed to be the best interests of motion picture enterprises, but the very situation illustrates the necessity of strong cohesive action along carefully thought out lines. Especially is it to be regretted that our organization was not older and better known so that it might have united with others working for the good of amusement interests.

"We are still at work on the Senate as well as on the House, which latter body will get the bill from the Senate. We have by no means given up work or hope. Our difficulties, while they may decrease our chance of complete success, have only made us work harder. We have the active co-operation of all the trades unions that will be affected by the tax on theaters—not only here in New York, but throughout the country. We have sent out thirty thousand pieces of mail to exhibitors and theater owners and to all interested in the abolition or lowering of the tax on theaters. We have taken extra floor space here and have had fifteen girls at work getting out mail.

"By the way, at an early date we are to have a meeting of the Board of Governors of this body, at which all board members allied with the motion picture industry also will be present. Yes, we expect Mr. Selig and Mr. Klein will be here from Chicago, and Mr. Lubin from Philadelphia, as well as others from this vicinity."

Siegmund Lubin is fourth vice-president of the United Managers' Theatrical Protective Association, and the executive committee for motion pictures are J. Stuart Blackton, Carl Laemmle, Samuel Long, Adolph Zukor and P. A. Powers.

The following is the recommendation that the association will submit to the conferrees on the war tax measure:

"It is respectfully suggested that the tax should first be graded by population, that is to say, a maximum of $100 be placed on Class A theaters in cities of 500,000 population and over, and graded into five divisions, these to be: (1) Theaters in cities of 500,000 population and over. (2) Cities under 500,000 and over 250,000. (3) Cities under 250,000 and over 100,000. (4) Cities under 100,000 and over 15,000, and (5) Cities under 15,000. We would further suggest that the theaters be divided into three classes: Class A playing theatrical attractions proper; class B, mixed (so-called small-time vaudeville and pictures), and class C, motion pictures exclusively. This grades the entrance charges to theaters. To be fair each of these classes should be divided into sections as to seating capacity, that is: (1) 300 and under, (2) over 300 and up to 600, (3) over 600 and up to 1,000 and (4) over 1,000. This is particularly true of motion picture houses. We believe the following would contribute considerably more than the theaters' just share of any war tax.

"In theaters of the first class, in cities of the first division (over 500,000), we suggest a tax of $100; in cities of the second division (over 250,000, but under 500,000), $50; in cities of the third division (under 250,000 and over 100,000), $15; in cities of the fourth division (under 100,000 and over 15,000), $15; in cities of the fifth division (under 15,000), $10.

"For theaters of the second class (vaudeville and pictures) in cities of the first division, $50; in cities of the second division, $35; in cities of the third division, $20; in cities of the fourth division, $10; in cities of the fifth division, $7.50.

"For motion picture houses in cities of the first division: Theaters seating 1,000 or over, $25; under 1,000 but over 600, $20; under 600, $15. In cities of the second division seating over 1,000, $20; between 600 and 1,000, $15; under 600, $12.50. In cities of the third division seating over 1,000, $15; between 600 and 1,000, $12.50; under 600, $10. In cities of the fourth division seating over 1,000, $10; between 600 and 1,000, $7.50; under 600, $5. In cities of the fifth division, $5."

KANSAS CITY EXCHANGE BURNED.

Fire in Quarters of Universal Film and Supply Company Causes Loss Estimated at $300,000—Partly Insured.

FIRE destroyed the Kansas City, Mo., exchange of the Universal Film and Supply Company Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 13, about 6:15 o'clock. Manager R. C. Cropper estimates the loss at about $300,000, part of which is covered by insurance. It is thought the fire started from defective wiring in the vault. All of the films in the house, about 4,000, were destroyed. Fortunately most of the late releases were out being exhibited and consequently bookings can be kept up until relief films from St. Louis and New York arrive. All of the books and accounts were saved. All posters were lost, this constituting a large element of the total damage.

Fortunately most of the employes had left the building and nobody was hurt. Within an hour after the firemen had gone the company was in touch with its customers and the St. Louis office, and their co-operation during the difficulties requested. By 10 o'clock offices had been established in the adjoining quarters recently vacated by the Mutual and service was being sent out as fast as it came in. W. H. Swanson, president of the Universal Film and Supply Company, was visiting the Kansas City exchange and was present during the fire. He highly praises the action of the employes.

CALIFORNIA EXHIBITORS ELECT OFFICERS.

At the annual convention of the California Exhibitors' League, held at San Francisco, October 6 to 9, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, H. L. Beach, Berkeley; vice-president, A. P. Tugwell, Los Angeles; secretary, W. A. Cory, San Francisco; treasurer, C. L. Mehrten, Berkeley; sergeant-at-arms, H. C. Schmidt, Palo Alto. W. H. Hilts of San Diego was elected national vice-president. It was decided to create the position of state organizer and to publish a bulletin for the benefit of the country members.

HERBERT BRENON RESIGNS FROM UNIVERSAL.

Herbert Brenon has resigned his position as producer for the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. Mr. Brenon's picture work began several years ago, when he went to the Imp studio as scenario editor. He was given a chance to make a picture and was successful. While with the company he has directed the making of several large subjects, among the more notable of which was "Neptune's Daughter." It was while working in this picture that Mr. Brenon was seriously hurt, owing to the breaking of the glass side of a large tank in which the director and Miss Kellermann were enacting a scene under water. Mr. Brenon's plans for the future have not as yet been divulged.

New Fields for American Film

Arthur Lang and Steven de Csesznak Discuss Ways and Means of Reaching South and Central American Buyers.

WHAT does the European War mean to the motion picture industry of this country? The same question has been applied in a general way to American industry as a whole, and the answer has been most favorable. Men who are deservedly considered experts in export trade and government bureaus and organizations whose business it has been to promote our foreign commerce have declared that the European conflict will place American manufactures far in the lead in the neutral markets of the world, and after the war will place us in a much more favorable position for the exchange of commodities with most of the belligerents.

But this is only a sweeping answer to a very general question. All American products will not be affected exactly alike. Some will be benefited more than others; some will find greater opportunities than others. The opportunities in many instances will be dissimilar and will require different treatment. By way of illustration, there are not the same opportunities in the neutral markets for American adding machines, motion picture supplies and dyestuffs. The first named article of American make has absolutely controlled the market and therefore canot expect anything but normal gains. The dyestuffs manufactured in this country are a negligible quantity, and it is a question whether the present efforts to develop an industry that will satisfy our domestic demand in quantity and quality would be successful. We never have attempted to compete with German manufactured dyestuffs, and it is quite possible that we never will be in a position to do so. Just as these two lines occupy extremely dissimilar positions, so does the American motion picture industry face a situation that applies to it alone, with opportunities that are offered to it exclusively and with problems that must be solved quite differently from those affecting other lines of American made goods. So much has been written and said regarding the possibilities for the development of American exports that the Moving Picture World sought to learn exactly what these possibilities offered to the manufacturers of projection machines, films and other motion picture supplies. With that object in view we consulted two men who are eminently well qualified to speak on this subject. They are Arthur J. Lang, export manager of the Nicholas Power Company, and Steven de Csesznak, a leading authority on foreign trade matters and the publisher of Export American Industries, which is the Official International Organ of the National Association of Manufacturers. Mr. Lang's familiarity with the industry and his knowledge of export methods and foreign conditions place him in a position to find a solution to the export problem. Especially does his eleven years' experience with Latin America, during much of which time he was on the ground, peculiarly fit him to size up the situation and to understand the residents of those countries and how to approach them for the establishment and development of business relations. The methods Mr. Lang has employed have been so successful that his company's product is now used in every country of the world. The same cannot be said for American films. Recently some of them have been introduced into Latin American markets and the Far East, but for the most part they are practically an unknown quantity outside of Europe.

Capt. Arthur J. Lang.

"Latin America has been a sadly neglected market by American film manufacturers," said Mr. Lang. "There are approximately 5,300 theaters in Central and South America, and the demand for good films is increasing rapidly. Latin Americans in the past obtained most of their films from Europe. In every populated section there are large exchanges that have handled these European films, and it has been difficult for our manufacturers to break into this business. Before the war started an attempt was inaugurated to divert the Latin American trade into American channels, and although this effort was not begun very far back enough success was made by a few enterprising film manufacturers of this country to indicate that they had started on the right track. Naturally the manufacturers who had the nerve to make the initial attempt were the ones most likely to receive the earliest and greatest benefits, and I have been watching with keen interest their early struggles and with considerable satisfaction their first successes.

"But now an entirely new situation—as remarkable as it was unexpected—has arisen, opening the way to the rapid development of export trade in American films and providing an opportunity not merely for the pioneers, but for all film manufacturers of this country to cash in heavily. Of course, unusual measures are suggested, if not absolutely required, by unusual circumstances. The present conditions warrant much more aggressive steps than might likely have been rewarded with immediate success up to two months ago. There is an opportunity, as great as it is real, for American manufacturers to capture the cream of the South American trade. It can be done by the usual conservative but slow and more or less laborious method of long distance correspondence. This method combined, of course, with a proper advertising campaign, is practically certain of satisfactory results, the principal necessity being to make a start in the right direction and to follow this up carefully and systematically. This is no more than has been satisfactorily worked out in the export development of many and various lines of American manufactures, and the same method can be applied with at least equal success to the export of American films, paying special attention, however, to the peculiarities that make the motion picture business different from other branches of commercial endeavor. But while stereotyped methods may have done very well under normal conditions, the opportunity is now so great as to require much broader and more aggressive methods than were suggested by previous conditions. The film companies should combine in sending a representative to Latin America to prepare the ground for the importation of American films on a much larger scale than would have been possible before the war. He should be a man that understands the South American countries and people, and who speaks their language. He should also be a man who is thoroughly acquainted with the motion picture business from every angle. Such a man could not only furnish the film companies with accurate and intelligent reports on the character of the theaters and their audiences, the local banking conditions, transportation facilities and other subjects essential to the rapid and profitable transaction of international commerce, but he would be invaluable in presenting the cause of American films to the large importers, theater syndicates and managers of the great countries to the South. Such a move would, undoubtedly, result in establishing American films on even a stronger basis than European films were established before the outbreak of hostilities.

"One thing is certain. This is the psychological time to introduce American films. Latin Americans have given a cordial reception to those they have seen hitherto and are anxious to see more. Just as our public likes to see films representing conditions in far-away lands, so are their audiences interested in films showing American life, institutions, humor, scenery, etc. They like our clean-cut drama, they are extremely fond of romances and they enjoy films with a strong touch of industrialism, especially if it borders on the spectacular, and they are keen for our western features. There is not one class of good film production that they do not thoroughly enjoy. Our big features should have a tremendous success, judging from the vogue of American films that have already been received. The best results, however, cannot be obtained in a moment. It takes two weeks or more to reach the most southern ports, so that manufacturers can readily understand that first results should not be expected too quickly."

At Mr. Lang's suggestion he and the World man paid a visit to the offices of the National Association of Manufacturers, at 30 Church street, where Mr. de Csesznak was interviewed. Mr. de Csesznak has been actively engaged in the export business and in the development of the country's foreign trade for many years. He has watched our exports increase in volume and has played a very active part in the tremendous development of the last ten years. It has been his mission to discover and develop opportunities for the establishment of various lines of American-made products, prompting and guiding the manufacturers of those particular lines, helping the manufacturers to rectify mistakes and to avoid pitfalls. It is natural, therefore, that Mr. de Csesznak was one of the first men in this country to appreciate the possibilities for the sale of American films in other parts of the world on a really large scale.

Mr. de Csesznak is eminently qualified to give advice on foreign trade matters. He has lived in several European countries and has visited all of them, in addition to making trips to other parts of the world. He is probably one of the keenest students in this country of political as well as commercial history, and he enjoys the advantage of studying such matters first-hand because of his ability to speak fluently and read eleven languages. In giving practical assistance to American manufacturers in planning and carrying out aggressive and intelligent export campaigns Mr. de Csesznak is assisted by the National Association's splendid service bureaus, which include what is probably the best translation staff in the United States, credit rating of approximately three hundred thousand business men in all parts of the world and a foreign trade library consisting of the latest directories from all parts of the globe, besides specially prepared lists of names and reports on conditions received from the association's foreign correspondents, who are 1,100 in number. Several film manufacturers have been enjoying for some time the services offered by Mr. de Csesznak and his organization and the publicity offered by Export American Industries, which is a business man's magazine of high quality and reaches the leading buyers in every foreign country.

"I made a very careful analysis of the export possibilities for American films," said Mr. de Csesznak, "before I brought the subject to the attention of the large producers. Quite a few of them have seen fit to follow my advice, and although they have not been in the export field very long their efforts have already been crowned with gratifying results. Since I first took up the foreign trade development of the American motion picture industry the situation has entirely changed. Where formerly there was only a fair chance of large results by employing persistent and systematic methods, the prospects of our film manufacturers doing a tremendous business have passed the stage of the slightest uncertainty and are now most positive. Any producer who has real good, interesting films can sell them in all other parts of the world. They have only to use the good business sense that has won them success in this country, adapting it to the peculiar conditions that pertain to export trade and regarding which there are ample facilities for their enlightenment and guidance.

"There is another phase of the situation and an exceedingly important one. While the source of supply formerly depended upon by the neutral markets is gone as a result of the European cataclysm, it will be possible for them to re-establish their former relations with European film manufacturers after the war is over and the countries involved have recovered from its disastrous effects. But this is merely a possibility, and just how likely affairs may take that course depends entirely on American film producers. In other words, the latter should not merely look to the present, but should build for the future. Foreign business men, just as ourselves, like to buy the right kind of goods at the right prices. They realize that commercial relations between two parties are supposed to be conducted on a basis of mutual advantage. They do not ask too much and wish merely to be treated fairly. They are much more opposed to making radical and frequent changes than the average business man in this country. It would be an easy matter, therefore, for our film manufacturers to establish export relations that would be as much to the disadvantage of foreign buyers to break off as it would be to the disadvantage of the manufacturers. This does not mean that special favors need be accorded to the foreign buyers. All that is necessary is the perfection of merchandising methods that will give these buyers good quality, the character of films their patrons demand, prompt service and other details that are necessary to the satisfactory transaction of business wherever it may be done."

Philippine Film Man Here.

R. F. Roces, Exchangeman and Exhibitor of Manila, Comes to New York to Buy Film.

THE war in Europe has in its effects reached to the far Philippines. R. F. Roces, secretary of the Ideal Moving Picture Company, of Manila, P. I., is now in New York buying films to supply the exchange of his concern and also its four theaters. The Ideal's houses, all in Manila, are the Ideal, seating 900; the Metropolitan, seating 1,000; the Patria, with a capacity of 1,500, and the Magallanes, accommodating 700. There are five exchanges altogether in the capital of the Philippines. Pathe Freres has one and the Universal of this city also is placing business now. The Ideal formerly has been supplied from Barcelona, Paris and London, but owing to the difficulty of communicating with the buyers in the respective European centers Mr. Roces was compelled to come to this country. He had sent messages, but could get no response. Already Mr. Roces has bought seven or eight thousand meters of American productions, and is still looking around.

Mr. Roces says his company advertises in the Philippine press, which means that space must be used in the papers printed in Spanish, English and Filipino. Picture theaters, he adds, are more liberal advertisers than are the legitimate houses. The usual prices of admission are 10, 20 and 25 cents. The first is for the main floor, or orchestra, the second for the balcony and the last for boxes. Programs average in length about 4,500 feet. Among the brands used by Mr. Roces' company are Gaumont, Nordisk, Pasquali, Itala, Ambrosio, Eclair, Aquila, Denmark film, and from the United States Vitagraph and Edison. These latter, by the way, come to Manila from Europe along with the others. The hours of exhibition are, for the principal house, from 1 to 12; the Metropolitan opens at 5 and closes at 12, and the other two open at sundown.

Mr. Roces laid emphasis on the fact that the films most popular in the Philippines were those of universal interest as opposed to subjects reflecting local conditions or depending upon events of a historical nature. The clientele in the islands varies widely. The sub-titles of the films are in both English and Spanish. It is interesting to note that while the Spanish is for the older residents of the islands, the English titles are for the benefit of the younger generation. Mr. Roces says the public school system of the Philippines is excellent and is diffusing a knowledge of English even in the remotest parts. In fact, Mr. Roces says, the further from Manila you go the more English you hear spoken.

Philippine exhibitors do not have to pay duty on films if they are entered in bond as theatrical effects and their stay in the islands is limited to four months. As film shipped to distant islands sometimes requires fifteen days for the journey, it often happens where craft is delayed by a typhoon or from other cause the exchange is subjected to the 35 per cent. duty for exceeding the stipulated bonding limit. Mr. Roces says perhaps one-third of the picture theaters in Manila are paying propositions; of the remainder it is doubtful. In the provinces there are few houses that run the year round. Some open the doors only when there is a prospect of making money. In the rainy season all of the provincial theaters are closed. While many houses are controlled by natives, there are a large number that are managed through the army post exchanges.

There is a police censorship of films in Manila, but Mr. Roces says his company has so far never had a subject rejected. This may be due, he says, partly to the fact that the company censors its own subjects before they are shown to the supervising authority. Speaking as to methods of construction of picture houses, Mr. Roces said one of the important factors is ventilation. Many of the houses are on the sides mostly doors and windows.

This is not Mr. Roces' first visit to the United States. In 1900 he came to California, remaining for five years to finish his education. He expects to go to London soon for a short business trip.

Seeking South American Trade

Universal Sends von Koenig as Its Special Ambassador of "That Universal Program."

AMONG those men versed on South American affairs probably none is better acquainted with the commercial situation as regards American relations than Alexander Keene von Koenig, who sailed on the Almirante recently for the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. Twenty years of his life have been spent in Spanish speaking countries, such as the Philippines, Brazil, Chili, Peru and the Argentine, during which time he made a careful study of commercial conditions of the various countries. For the past two years he has been handling the export department for the Universal, building up trade with South America.

Alexander K. von Koenig.

Simultaneously with the beginning of the European hostilities, President Laemmle foresaw the opportunity for switching over the foreign moving picture business in South America and coupling it with the Universal's present export business to that territory. In discussing the conditions when sailing, Mr. von Koenig said:

"A great many of the film buyers and exhibitors of South America have had little opportunity thus far to realize the quality of up-to-date American films. Heretofore they have tied themselves heart and soul to European manufacturers and European products. This supply is now almost entirely cut off. This present conflict, which prevents their getting European products, necessitates their looking elsewhere, and it is natural that they should look to us. This is our opportunity to convince the Latin-American exhibitor and South Americans in general that the American-made films are the kind which will meet with their entire approval."

"It will be my business to convince them that the Universal comedies are exactly what they want, and that the Universal features contain all the qualities which the Latin-American requires. The variety of our program is such that it will never become monotonous and there is no repetition of plot nor incident which the South Americans so often find in the European manufactured films.

"Latin-Americans make it a point to visit Europe every year, never thinking that the United States can offer to them more and better sights and products than Europe. It is to be hoped that the present conflict will help to direct the eyes of our South American brethren to this country, to make them more partial to its products. The reason for this is almost entirely racial and easy to overcome if the American manufacturers take the proper steps.

"There is one thing in which no country in the world can beat the United States and that is machinery, and tools of all kinds. Of course, firms of European origin still show partiality to machinery of home manufacture, but they find it more and more difficult to meet the American competition. Under this head comes motion picture machinery of all kinds, and I will be able to supply all demands for this class of goods. I have supplied my customers in South America with motion picture machines for some time, and I have not in all the time that I have been handling them had a single call for a single part. This is a unique record. I expect to do as big a business in this as in films.

"We are going down to South America thoroughly equipped for a tremendous campaign for the Universal and with the carte blanche as to method, and we, Mr. Westholm (his assistant) and I, are positive that great developments will take place."

Maude Fealy Starring for Hub Company

Popular Actress Working for the Holland Film Manufacturing Company, a New Boston Organization.

AS the star for the first motion picture producing company in Boston, Miss Maude Fealy is now at work in the studios of the Holland Film Manufacturing Company. Miss Fealy's introduction to picture followers was through her fine performances in Thanhouser and Majestic features. She had long been on the stage before going to New Rochelle. She has played in the support of Henry Irving, William Gillette, Holbrook Blinn, E. S. Willard and Richard Mansfield, among others. The coming winter she will star at the Cort Theater, in Boston, in "The Right Princess." Her stage appearance will not interfere with her screen work, as it will require her absence from the studio only on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons. Miss Fealy's partial return to the boards indicates a change of heart in a way. It was only last winter that she told a World man, talking with her in the Thanhouser studio, that she was glad her stage experiences were behind her—that now she had a home, with her family around her. She distinctly disavowed that the footlights had any lure for her; but, after all, she has simply exercised a woman's prerogative and changed her mind.

Miss Maude Fealy.

The Holland studio is at 105 Lawrence Avenue, in the Roxbury district of the Hub. Herbert B. Holland is the chief of the producing forces. William F. Haddock is his right-hand man. Mr. Haddock is well known in the film industry, having directed pictures at Edison, Eclair and, more recently, for the All Star. He is now working in his own country. His native town is Portsmouth, N. H., but a few miles north of Boston. James C. Coveney is sales manager for the Holland company and William H. McMahon is publicity manager. A seventy-five-foot square stage has been erected on the grounds of the Stewart estate. This will as the weather gets cooler be surrounded by a glass-roofed and inclosed structure. Other buildings to be erected are for the storing of properties and also for a garage. The mansion has been remodeled to accommodate the officers, players and artisans, with kitchens, dining-rooms, dressing-rooms, and developing and printing rooms.

The first release of the Holland company will be in November. Two pictures are already completed. "Mary Jane's Burglar" is a one-reel subject from the pen of Miss Fealy. "The Girl from Tim's Place" is in two reels. It is adapted from the novel by William Munn.

"FANTASMA."

Charles M. Seay, the Edison director, has about completed the five-reel production of "Fantasma" for his company. A great deal of time and care has been devoted to this forthcoming feature, which the Edison Company expects to be one of the most pretentious ever turned out by an American manufacturer. The scenario for "Fantasma" was made under the supervision of Mr. Seay. George Hanlon, Jr., of the famous Hanlon Brothers, will be featured in "Fantasma."

Sir James M. Barrie Visits Studio

AT the studio of the Famous Players, Sir James M. Barrie last week spent three hours. It was the first visit of the distinguished English dramatist and author to a motion picture establishment, and under the guidance of Adolph Zukor and Daniel Frohman he watched with deep interest the taking of scenes, the developing and printing of the films, and afterward in the projection room looked upon "Tess of the Storm Country." Sir James termed his visit a "peep into fairyland," and expressed astonishment at the methods and mechanism of the big plant. He was much interested in the story of Tess, which was selected as a purely American subject. Mr. Barrie admitted that from this aspect the picture interested him more than might have been the case with a world-famous classic.

Sir J. M. Barrie.

"This has been my first experience in noting the operation of a motion picture rehearsal," said the English visitor in speaking of his visit to the Famous Players, "and I have found it most engrossing. There is a great deal of art and skill displayed in developing the scenes of a play as I saw it manifested there. In fact, we are in the presence of a new and most significant art. It also reveals a new and interesting condition in dramatic construction, so far as it affects picture work, for it visualizes motives and situations which develop and accentuate character, so that all these important details are convincing and lucid to the observer.

"The novel may withhold its mystery until the end of the final chapter, but the photoplay, like the acted drama, holds no secrets from its audiences, at least not for any length of time. I have noted, too, that while no words are audible, the action in which the players are concerned is so graphic that one can be readily conscious of the actor's personality. The great actor stands out on the screen just as he does on the stage.

"Of course, I hold firm to the living stage as the supreme place for theatrical art and achievement, and as the place that reveals the genius of the actor, but I realize now more than ever that picture plays are an attractive form of amusement for all kinds of people and that they have great power to stimulate interest in an educational as in a dramatic way."

Through its recent affiliation with Charles Frohman, the producer who controls the dramatic output of Sir James, the Famous Players will in time to come film several of the Barrie plays. It is through this connection that the English dramatist became interested in pictures. The adaptation of the Barrie dramas to the screen will be effected as soon as Maude Adams has finished her work in them. Miss Adams will be seen, among other subjects, in "The Little Minister." The story has been used before in pictures, but as Daniel Frohman expressed it the other day, the appearance of Miss Adams in her favorite role will give the production an "authoritative pre-eminence." It was through the medium of this play that Miss Adams was developed into a star. Mr. Barrie had seen Miss Adams in "Rosemary" when she was leading woman for John Drew. He followed her work with the closest attention. For a long time he had sought a woman who filled his ideal of Lady Babbie. Sir James found that ideal in Miss Adams. "It is now possible for the dramatization of my 'Little Minister'," said the author with enthusiasm, at the conclusion of the performance. It was the beginning of a long career for the Barrie plays and a strong friendship between the author and the star. During the two weeks Mr. Barrie was in this country he visited the actress at her farm in the Adirondacks.

After a fortnight that was crowded with activity Mr. Barrie returned to London, sailing Wednesday, October 14. His visit will be long remembered by the Famous Players' staff.

Fogarty Opens Screen Theater

Photoplay Stars Speak at Ex-Police Sergeant's Picture House—Capacity Taxed On Opening Night.

KING BAGGOT and Ben Wilson, two prominent Universal photoplayers, made speeches at the dedication of the Screen Theater, 149th Street and Eighth Avenue, New York City, when that house was opened on Friday evening, October 9. Both stars eulogized Daniel J. Fogarty, a retired New York police sergeant, who is owner and manager of the house, not only on the fact that he has bestowed upon his theater an appellation which is symbolic of the nature of the amusement house, but also on Mr. Fogarty's excellent work while on the police force; for both stars know the ex-police sergeant. Mr. Baggot in his speech said that while every moving picture theater in New York and elsewhere must by the very nature of things have a projection surface which is called a screen, not one of the managers in New York thought of giving his house the cognominal appendage of "screen," and he believes that Mr. Fogarty is the first man in this city to christen his theater by that name.

The doors were opened on schedule time and there was a continual stream of struggling humanity trying to get in until the last show. At one time the crowds were so large and insistent upon gaining admission that the big collapsible iron gates had to be closed. One could easily have assumed that something for nothing was being given away by the manager so patiently did the crowds wait to be admitted. The fact that it was advertised extensively that King Baggot and Ben Wilson would appear in person had a great deal to do with the tremendous business done on the opening night. This announcement added to the personal influence that Mr. Fogarty has with the people of his neighborhood proved to be a strong incentive for business.

Many thousands of New Yorkers know Mr. Fogarty personally. Through his kindness and generosity and work while on the police force for twenty years he has earned the soubriquet of "the policeman with a heart." He has saved eight lives and has received a medal for each one which he shows with considerable pride. His sympathy for the widows, who through the loss of their husbands were left in straitened circumstances, was so actuated by the appalling conditions that met his eyes while attending to his duties that he founded the Widows and Orphans Relief Fund, the treasury of which was supplied with money by the exhibition of a film entitled "The Life of a New York Policeman," which was written by Fogarty and by the production of a playlet also written by the ex-sergeant, but in collaboration with Newton MacMillan and Paul Armstrong. The playlet has for its setting the interior of a police station in the Tenderloin district of New York. Minstrel shows and police bands organized by Fogarty also helped to swell the treasury funds.

The Screen Theater has a seating capacity of 600, and is as nearly fireproof in its construction as present building material will permit. It is in a good neighborhood location and several car lines pass the door. The lobby is wide, and decorated with neatly-arranged framed photographs of photoplayers. The structure is one story in height and cost about $10,000 to build. The dimensions of the operating room are 9 by 14 feet. There is a mechanics' room adjoining it, 8 by 14 feet. Included in the up-to-date equipment of the house are two Simplex motor-driven machines and a Mirroroide screen. The throw from machine to screen is 88 feet. Prices, to matinees is 5 cents, while 10 and 15 cents will be charged for evening shows, the latter price being for reserved seats. William Kessel, an experienced man in the picture business, is assistant manager. A diversified program consisting of about six reels are given. Pictures are changed daily.

NOT KLEINE'S "POMPEII" PICTURE.

In Pittsburgh news column published on page 217 of the issue dated October 10, there appeared a mention to the effect that the Liberty Film Renting Company of Pittsburgh has issued a warning that persons trespassing upon its territorial rights for the picture entitled "The Last Days of Pompeii," will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law. The George Kleine Attractions fear that the interpretation of the item will be that they have sold rights to their picture of the same name when as a matter of fact the Kleine picture was not put out on a state right basis at all. The version owned by the Pittsburgh company has no relation to the Kleine production, and exhibitors deserving to show that picture should not be influenced by the efforts of the Liberty Company to protect their own subject.

Censors After Traveling Exhibitors

Supervision Originally Intended to Affect Kansas City Picture Men Amended to Operate Against Itinerants.

THAT the finest kind of harmony exists in Kansas City, Mo., between the film exchanges and exhibitors and the local board of censorship was demonstrated Tuesday, October 6, when the managers and the chief film censor held a meeting and reached an amicable agreement on a recent decision of the board. The board had ordered that all censored parts of films must be cut out in the projection room of the board, and the censored parts left there. Local managers objected strenuously to this requirement, and the air for a day or so was full of potential fight. The order was to have been put into force October 5, but was delayed until the meeting Tuesday, at which Fred F. McClure, manager of the recreation department of the Board of Public Welfare, said he would recommend to the board a modification of the order.

Mr. McClure explained to the exchange managers and exhibitors that the board sought to devise a way to assure cutting of objectionable parts by operators who bring films into Kansas City for short engagements, men not connected with any local moving picture enterprises. These men are usually not well known to the officials of the board. Often they are owners of only a few films, and their business consists in showing from place to place, soon exhausting the patronage for that class of stuff. Heretofore the local board of censorship had accepted the verdicts of the National Board of Censorship without question, and had ordered cuts on its own account only when there was no approval by the National Board. When cuts were ordered, the film owners were supposed to make them before showing the pictures. The only variation from the rule was that the local board reserved the right to censor for itself white slave and dope pictures. It is said that, especially in the case of the casual film exhibitors, there were quite a few violations of the orders of the board. Naturally these were mostly with the casuals, as the resident exhibitors have always been most solicitous to co-operate with the board.

At the meeting Tuesday Mr. McClure declared he had had no complaints whatever against any of the resident exhibitors. At their suggestion he promised to recommend to the board that the order be restricted to the non-resident film exhibitors, and this probably will be the result. The former order of the board will stand; only white slave and dope films, which the reports of the national board received by the local censors indicate might contain matter locally objectionable, will be projected before the local board, and where these films are under the control of resident managers these managers will be trusted to make the cuts. Casual exhibitors must make the cuts at the board's rooms, and leave the cuts there.

The order issued is to be effective October 1, and will probably apply only to the non-resident film managers and to those having no permanent local representative.

Vitagraph Theater Changes Bill

Two Strong Dramatic Productions, "The Locked Door" and "The Tangle," Entertain Good-Sized House.

THE Vitagraph Theater changed its bill on Columbus Day, October 12. There was a good-sized house in attendance when the curtain went down for the first subject, which was the regular release of the day. "Midst Woodland Shadows" is a single reel story written and produced by Ralph Ince. The leads are played by Earle Williams and Anita Stewart. The picture is what the title indicates. There are fine backgrounds of stream and wood. The strength of the subject lay in the work of the players and the director rather than in its plot.

"The Locked Door" is described as a fire-prevention romance. It was written by Special Fire Inspector William B. Northrup, picturized by George H. Plympton and directed by Tefft Johnson. Mr. Johnson also played the lead in the picture. The subject was produced in collaboration with the Fire Department, assisted by the Police Department of New York City. The players beside Mr. Johnson are William Dunn, Edward Elkas, Ethel Lloyd, Charles Edwards, Jack Bulger, Charles Wellesley and Eulalie Jensen. The picture may be of an educational and instructive nature, but there can be no gainsaying its thrilling situations and its great interest. "The Locked Door" is unique.

"The Tangle" is a four-part military picture the story of which is by Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady, late U. S. A., and was produced by Captain Harry Lambart. Infantry, cavalry and artillery of the United States regular forces collaborated in the making of the picture and contributed much to the effectiveness of the subject. "The Tangle" is novel in that it contains no "villain." The nearest approach to a heavy part is the character of the wife of the colonel. By her attitude undoubtedly she alienates to a great degree the sympathy of the audience; she is portrayed as a selfish, extremely jealous woman, who through no fault of her own remains faithful to her soldier husband. There are strong moments in the story, one of the best being the dialogue between the wife and her one-time sweetheart, the lieutenant, with the husband and his friend looking on. Darwin Karr as the lieutenant, Naomi Childers as the wife, L. Rogers Lytton as the husband and Charles Wellesley as the friend composed the quartet in the scene. To these players went the greater share of the honors. "The Tangle" should be a popular picture, especially in view of the timeliness of the military scenes, which were made in Texas just prior to and during the departure of United States troops for Vera Cruz. One notable factor of the presentation at the Vitagraph Theater was the music, as conceived and executed by Organist Frank R. White.

GOVERNOR AND LEGISLATURE ACT IN "U" DRAMA.

For what is said to be the first time in the history of moving pictures, the governor of a state and his entire legislature participated in a photoplay when Stuart Paton, director took a company to Columbus, Ohio, to stage the picture "Of and For the People." It is a picture in which the extreme benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Law is visualized, containing a deep meaning and lesson. Matt Moore, who plays the lead, acted along with Governor Cox and the Senators.

The action took place on Sunday, that being the only day that the enormous arcs could be suspended from the ceiling of the Senate Chamber. These lights were of a special construction to meet the added requirements of the spacious chamber.

Governor Cox so appreciated the merits of the picture that he dropped many important engagements in Toledo and hurried to the scene of the staging. All day Sunday the company worked under Mr. Paton's able direction, using first the Senate Chamber and then the Governor's private office.

After the work had been completed, several of Columbus' more prominent citizens banded together and Mr. Paton and Mr. Moore were dined, complimented and generally entertained.

INTERSTATE HEARING FOR FILM SHIPPERS.

The various express companies are looking for an amendment to the present classification governing the shipment of moving picture films sent C. O. D. The changes contemplates the prohibition of the privilege of reel examination on all such shipments. The present classification prohibits the privilege of screen examination; that of reel examination will be in addition thereto.

A further contemplated change provides that all packages containing dangerous articles as defined by the regulations prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission which are refused by the consignee, or which cannot be delivered within forty-eight hours after arrival at destination, may be stored, providing a suitable place is available off the company's premises, otherwise they must be returned at the expiration of forty-eight hours to shipper, subject to charges both ways.

The Interstate Commerce Commission will give a hearing concerning the propriety of these and other desired changes at 10 a. m. October 30.

PERKINS IN "WHO GOES THERE?"

Walter E. Perkins, the quaint comedian who will be remembered for his remarkable interpretation of Augustus Keene Shaver in the Edison three-reel comedy, "My Friend from India," is being featured in another of H. A. Du Souchet's successes "Who Goes There?" Mr. Perkins, who starred in this play on Broadway as "Toppy," the young, bashful lieutenant, will appear in the same role in the three-reel photo play now being produced by the Edison Company under the direction of Ashley Miller.

ADVERTISING PICTURE HOUSE IN STREET CARS.

The Lindell, a new moving picture theater at Grand avenue and Herbert Street, St. Louis, Mo., is advertising in the street cars, an innovation in that city. The neatly framed signs announce the Lindell's programs of first run features.

Fox Talks of Plans

President of the Box Office Attractions Company Has Many Good Subjects Coming.

WILLIAM FOX, president of the Box Office Attractions Company, discussing his plans for the season of 1914 and 1915 said: "We have acquired the motion picture rights to fifty of the biggest of the dramatic successes the stage has ever known, together with the picture rights of the most successful 'best sellers.' These dramas and novels will be produced and the star parts be played by Broadway favorites. In a good many instances the star, having played the original part in the stage production, will be engaged for the photoplay. Our first releases are such popular successes as 'The Walls of Jericho,' 'The Thief,' 'The Children of the Ghetto' and 'Life's Shop Window.' In these productions will be starred respectively, Edmund Breese, Dorothy Donnelly and Wilton Lackaye. Robert Buhler will be in Miss Donnelly's supporting company.

Dorothy Donnelly.

"We have arranged with Henri Bernstein, personally, for the screen production of his play 'The Thief,' this well-known drama in which Margaret Illington and Kyrle Bellew created a sensation and held the boards for two years for a phenomenal run at Frohman's Lyceum Theater, New York. Thousands were turned away from the theater nightly. It was one of the few plays that really had the S. R. O. sign out every night of its career during the season of 1907-8."

"The Thief" is regarded as Henri Bernstein's most remarkable achievement. The characterizations are not only skillfully delineated, but the action and dramatic suspense is sustained throughout. The lead affords an unusual opportunity for emotional acting. This part entrusted to Dorothy Donnelly, will receive the same creative interpretation that she gave the part of Madame X, which she created. Miss Donnelly's career on the stage has been a succession of triumphs. She is one of the few emotional actresses who can play a part of this type and do so with convincing realism.

Edmund Breese.

"The Walls of Jericho" will be staged as originally produced by James K. Hackett at the Hackett Theater, New York. The play was written by that well-known dramatist, Alfred Suttro, who came into prominence after the production of the play. Edmund Breese has been engaged to play the philanthropist; Jack Fobisher, the hero.

"The Children of the Ghetto," another popular drama and novel, is being prepared with the assistance of the author, Israel Zangwill. This story is regarded as the best book ever written about those interesting people of the slums. It is a story of the children of Israel, their struggles and aspirations. Their defeats are as many as their victories. Wilton Lackaye will reappear in the character he played on the legitimate stage.

"Life's Shop Window," the powerful drama and novel by Victoria Cross, will be produced with the popular screen actors, Claire Whiteny and Stuart Holmes in the leading parts.

Apart from his big production plans, Mr. Fox, with the assistance of Winfield R. Sheehan, general manager of the Box Office Attraction Company, have organized a chain of exchanges that cover the country from New York to San Francisco and from Maine to Florida. The branches are in charge of men who are conversant with local conditions. These exchanges are now flourishing in the following cities: Boston, Syracuse, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, St. Louis, Kansas City, Dallas, San Francisco, Denver, Minneapolis, Chicago and Seattle.

In talking about the exchanges, Mr. Fox said: "The exchanges are now booking productions made under the Balboa, Nemo and White Star brands. They are booking three a week, together with single-reel comedies to fill in."

"This will be a banner picture year," Mr. Fox added after speaking of his plans, "and I expect there will be business enough for all. It will be a question of merit and the man who'll have the goods will get the money."

Talks on Advertising by Pictures

Motion Picture Publicity Increased Company's Business Over 14 per cent. Last Year, Says Charles M. Lemperly.

POSSIBILITIES of advertising and educational campaigns through the use of motion pictures were described by Charles Mitchell Lemperly, advertising manager of the Sherwin-Williams Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, before the eleventh annual convention of the Affiliated Advertising Clubs of Cleveland, Buffalo, Rochester and Detroit, at the latter city on October 3. "We find motion pictures employed in selling washing powder, paint, boots and shoes, ladies' clothing, men's clothing, etc.," he said. "To the wide-awake business man it must be apparent that motion picture advertising is the factor he will have to deal with as a regular publicity medium within a very short time. While magazines, newspapers and many other forms of advertising now in use will always be used and used to good advantage, the time is approaching rapidly when the business man will have to get away from the old conventional methods and employ a medium that will allow him to put that thrill of human interest into his message to the public. Can you imagine anything more convincing to a customer or a prospect than for a manufacturer to take his factory to that prospect, the very atmosphere vibrating with energy, every man and machine on the job turning out the product? Can you think of anything that would create a more indelible impression?

"The great possibilities of educational or industrial motion pictures, of course, lie largely in the matter of circulation. The more film circulated, the greater the possibility for the advertiser. As a medium of small town circulation it is doubtful if there is any better advertising proposition on the market than the motion pictures, and this has already been proved by many manufacturers. Other great possibilities of the motion picture are its use for convention work at churches, Y. M. C. A.'s, institutions, etc.

"There are great possibilities in motion pictures to land new agents and dealers for manufacturers. Salesmen carrying films and portable motion picture machines can so place their factory and their proposition before the prospective dealer that the order is as good as closed before the power is turned off the machine. There are tremendous possibilities in schoolroom, college halls, libraries, and educational institutions for the teaching of history, geography, botany, or, in fact, any of these studies.

"We can honestly say that moving pictures have increased our business, in actual sales, over 14 per cent. in the past year."

Trigger Has New Office

Refuses Re-Election as President of the New York City Exhibitors' Association, but Becomes Chairman of the Executive Committee.

THERE was a meeting of the members of the New York Exhibitors' Association at the Marlboro Hotel on Friday, October 9, at which 230 exhibitors are reported to have been present. The principal business of the meeting was the election of officers in conformity to a new constitution and bylaws recently approved by the members.

The election of officers resulted as follows: President, William A. Landau, Heights Theater; vice-president for Manhattan, Morris Needles, Auditorium Theater; vice-president for Brooklyn, William H. Hollander, Old Postoffice Theater; vice-president for the Bronx, A. Coleman, of Coleman's Theater; vice-president for Queens, Robert C. Whitten, Goldenrod Theater; recording secretary, Adolph Weiss; financial secretary, William Brandt, Clinton Court Theater; treasurer, Grant W. Anson, Star Theater; finance committee, Edward Valensi, Windsor Theater; P. Rosensen, Greenpoint Theater, and A. Baurenfreund, Model Theater.

There was a strong desire on the part of the members of the association to re-elect Samuel Trigger to the office of president, a position he has held with considerable ability for the past three years, but Mr. Trigger refused to allow his name to be presented for that office. A place was made for him, however, on the executive committee provided for by the new constitution and he was unanimously elected chairman of that body which is made up of the following named exhibitors:

Samuel H. Trigger, Tremont Theater, chairman executive board; M. Tischler, Rivington Casino; P. Gootenberg, Tuxedo Theater; Wm. Hilkemeier, Jefferson Photoplay; A. A. Corn, Grange Theater; N. Hirsch, Royal Theater; S. Rhonheimer, Ronly Theater; M. Oestreicher, Franklin Theater; Lee A. Ochs, Costello Theater; Edward Valensi, Windsor Theater; J. Forster, Crescent Comedy; L. F. Blumenthal, Palace Theater; A. Phillipson, Madison Theater; Charles Fisher, Decatur Theater; C. R. Martineau, Hanover Theater; S. Schwartz, Crown Theater; H. Hartsall, Bunny Theater; W. B. Fulmer, Montauk Arcade; P. Rosenson, Greenpoint Star; A. Bauernfreund, Model Theater; M. Marias, Rockaway Theater; M. Warshower, Mt. Morris Theater; A. Weiss, Avenue A Theater.

The executive board comes in under a provision of the new constitution which divides Greater New York, according to the senatorial districts, and requires a representative from each district to be a member of the board. These members shall be chairmen of the exhibitors of their respective districts and the entire committee thus formed shall constitute the governing body of the association. It will be the duty of the chairman of each district to keep in close touch with the state senator, legislators and aldermen in his district and be prepared at all times to combat unfavorable legislation or procure the passage of legislation calculated to favor the industry. The board shall meet once a month to transact such business as may come before it.

A vote of thanks was tendered the retiring officers and the meeting adjourned to meet on Friday, October 16, at the same place for installation of officers.

PRESIDENT PEARCE MAKES A SHORT TRIP WEST.

President Marion S. Pearce has just returned to Baltimore from a trip through the West in the interests of the league. He finds conditions as a whole very encouraging, and especially in Kansas, where they have just closed a most successful state convention. On this occasion many matters of vital interest to every exhibitor in the state were transacted and much good for the general welfare of the league in that locality accomplished.

President W. B. Moore, of the Kansas state branch, was especially enthusiastic regarding the league work in his territory and took great pleasure in announcing that they had decided on a definite membership campaign. He looks forward confidently to the next convention, which will be held in Emporia, Kansas, some time during the coming March, when he feels sure that almost every exhibitor in the state will, by that time, be a member of our league.

President Pearce also stopped off in Illinois in the interests of reorganizing the state. He devoted here as much time as he felt he could spare, although realizing the importance of being in Washington, where he has been keeping in close touch with the progress of the war tax measure pending in Congress.

"Pope Pius X. and the Vatican"

A Series of Rare Motion Pictures Finely Presented at the Hippodrome by Harry Raver.

A SERIES of motion pictures entitled "Pope Pius X. and the Vatican" were shown at the Hippodrome on Sunday, Oct. 11. Both the matinee and the night performance were well attended. The pictures have been taken by James Slevin for the Sacred and Historic Film Company and show views of ancient Rome, glimpses of medieval Rome and many of the great churches in the Eternal City. The pictures of the Vatican, both interior and exterior, are the first of their kind. Among them are scenes of impressive ceremonies held in St. Peters. The great paintings and decorations of the Sistine Chapel were especially fine. The series ended with a number of splendid motion pictures of the late Pontiff Pius X.

The big stage of the Hippodrome had been converted into the exterior of a Gothic church. Stained glass windows slowly and faintly illuminated the scene to a solemn prelude on the organ. Presently the side doors of the church opened and preceded by lantern bearers and men-at-arms an impressive procession of nuns and monks walked on the stage singing ancient chants. A moment later the main door of the church opened and a huge brilliantly lighted cross became visible surrounded by a choir of priests. Slowly the light died away, the chant came to an end and the pictures began. Music and stage management were under the direction of Manuel Klein, the well-known music director of the Hippodrome. The lecture introducing and accompanying the pictures was delivered by W. Stephen Bush.

The American rights for the pictures have been acquired by Harry R. Raver, who is assisted in the management of the enterprise by Joseph Farnham.

Maym Kelso Buys a Bale

MAYM KELSO, well known to thousands of Southerners and New Yorkers for her work in the "legitimate" and on the screen, has issued an appeal to her fellow photoplayers to cooperate with moving picture exhibitors throughout the country to help along the "Buy-a-Bale-of-Cotton" movement which has the approval of President Wilson, his Cabinet and other Government officials.

Maym Kelso.

Miss Kelso, a loyal Southerner herself, has bought five hundred pounds of cotton to help the cause along—one big, wire-bound bale, compressed and encased in burlap. It cost her ten cents a pound, $50 for the whole bale, but she does not reckon the cost when sentiment for her beloved Southland enters into the matter.

With cotton down to six and one-half cents a pound, the situation in the South for growers is a serious one, while in the New England States thousands of factory operatives are out of work. Half of the 14,000,000 bales of cotton which are now stored away in the warehouses of the South would have been marketed in Europe if it had not been for the war. At $50 a bale that means a loss of $350,000,000 to the South at the outset.

Miss Kelso has sent a check for $50 to the Atlanta "Georgian," in return for which she was given a certificate entitling her to one bale of "distress" cotton. She makes this suggestion to theatrical and motion picture managers:

"Mr. Theater Owner and Exhibitor: Please put a box in your lobby into which your audiences can drop coins, having a placard announcing what the money is needed for; have a slide made for the same purpose. Let the audience know from the screen the amount collected each day. Your warehouse receipt will make a good lobby display and when the cotton is sold, hold a voting contest to decide to what charity the proceeds shall be given. The good deed is done at a single stroke. The newspapers, always so ready to help a worthy cause, will give publicity to your effort."

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

By James S. McQuade.

A CORRESPONDENT contributes the accompanying article, using the pen name of "An Ultimate Consumer" and the heading, "Rising Prices and the High Cost of Inefficiency." Here it is; and I bespeak for it careful reading and unprejudiced criticism:

We are frequently reminded that the cost of making motion pictures is soaring upward in company with the cost of living, and the prophets of higher costs in picture making, like the food barons, joyfully pass the burden on to the ultimate consumer. Let the manufacturer increase his prices to the exchange; let the exchange increase its charge to the exhibitor; and let the exhibitor with sandbag or billy levy the burden upon the public. Simple, isn't it?

It does not seem to have occurred to either prophet or baron that the mine they are working may not prove inexhaustible; or, to change the simile, that there is danger of killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. Farmer and merchant, manufacturer and politician, sociologist and statesman, educator and preacher all unite—and some of them properly in asking the ultimate consumer to pay the ultimate cost.

Poor ultimate consumer! Are there none so poor as to do thee reverence? Must it be that there shall be saddled upon your shoulders all the sins and extravagances of society, all the burdens no one else will carry?

The prophets of higher cost in picture making are reminded of the lesson taught by Brandeis and Emerson to the railroads the lesson of efficiency. And they are asked to subtract from their prices the cost of inefficiency before they pass these prices on to the public.

It is conceded that great improvements have been and are being made in the manufacture and projection of motion pictures, as well as in the character of the playhouses. These improvements have called for large expenditures of money and will continue to do so. But the fact that extraordinary expenditures have been made does not, of itself, warrant an increase in the price charged to the public. There has been a tremendous growth in the patronage of the motion picture theater in recent years, else these extraordinary expenditures would not have been made. Some portion of these expenditures must be held to be offset by the added profits accruing because of the increased volume of business. Ordinarily, an added volume of business should result in reduced overhead or fixed charges and a corresponding increase in profits. If these conditions do not obtain, an investigation is in order. If it be urged that increased profits have not accompanied the remarkable growth of the motion picture business, that statement should be supported by explanation, and both statement and explanation should be challenged if they do not recognize inefficiency as an element in profit reduction.

To an outsider it seems unlikely that the motion picture business can have reached its present proportions so speedily without having brought with it serious defects in equipment and management—evils which almost invariably accompany the rapid growth of industrial enterprises, particularly in new fields. It is generally conceded that the mechanical equipment of the motion picture business was, for many years, notoriously inadequate and inefficient. The early manufacturers of motion picture equipment entered a field in which the machinery used had not been fully developed. Instead of setting themselves to the task of producing machines of high efficiency, they seem to have been concerned primarily with getting to the market with something to sell to those who had been caught by the motion picture craze. Later builders adopted a different policy. But much of the machinery now employed in the motion picture business dates back to those early days and, wherever it is used, it is responsible for waste.

The Moving Picture World recently published some articles advocating the standardization of motion picture machinery and equipment. If the statements contained in these articles may be accepted as accurate, the manufacture of motion pictures is seriously interfered with because no standard has been set up to which all machinery and equipment must conform. It appears that there is no universally accepted standard of film perforation; that the film movement mechanism of the various machines is not standardized; and that camera manufacturers have not thought it worth while to agree upon a common point on the film at which all pictures should start. It is said that the trouble is further aggravated by the use of machinery and equipment of such inferior design and construction as to seriously hamper production and to make really satisfactory results impossible. If these things are true, they constitute an indictment of the motion picture business. Likewise, if they are true, the business should be reformed or regenerated before it is sought to pass an undue proportion of its burdens on to the ultimate consumer in the form of increased admission prices.

By all means let a fair percentage of the increased cost of making motion pictures be paid by the public. Better scenarios, better costuming, finer settings, better acting, better houses, better projection—these are among the things the cost of which the public should share. But the ultimate consumer should not be penalized by including in his tax for entertainment charges which originate in defective machinery or inefficient management.

One need not be engaged in the motion picture business in order to rejoice in its splendid achievements or to appreciate its tremendous possibilities. The business is so great that it cannot afford to ask the public to suffer vicariously for its sins, whether of omission or commission. Because this is so, it should purge itself of inefficiency, whether of machines or of men, and ask the public to pay only fair profits based on necessary and legitimate costs.

With no intentional discourtesy to my gifted correspondent, I must say that to me the study of the "poor ultimate consumer," in the moving picture business, makes a rare farcical appeal. Of all consumers in the world, not even omitting the tramp, he gets more for his money than any other. We are constantly beseeching exhibitors not to spoil him altogether by running into bankruptcy in order to provide him with a program of ten reels for five cents; but they continue to do it, and "poor ultimate consumer" soon forgets them and continues to get more than good value at the minimum charge.

"Poor ultimate consumer" often sees for five or ten cents productions whose original cost would run over $100,000! In only one thing is he poor, as far as moving pictures are concerned, and that because of the education thrust upon him by extravagant exhibitors—he is poor in his appreciation of the true value of moving pictures, and will remain so until exhibitors unite and place the proper value on them.

Moving picture manufacturers—that is, those worth while—have been working to reduce the cost of inefficiency since they cut their eye teeth in the game. They should pay great heed, however, to the necessity for the standardization of motion picture machinery and equipment, as advocated in this article.

De Luxe Edition of "The Adventures of Kathlyn."

The Kathlyn Williams de luxe edition of "The Adventures of Kathlyn," restricted to 100 numbered copies, is just out and is being presented to that number of favored people by the famous and fair Queen of Allaha, now holding court in Los Angeles, at Edendale.

The writer has been the favored recipient of No. 3, and he takes this opportunity to make deferential obeisance to Her Majesty and humbly to convey his thanks for this distinguished mark of her esteemed consideration.

The work is of octavo size, and comprises 375 pages. It is handsomely bound in brown morocco, with deckel edge paper and gilt top face. It has been published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, of Indianapolis, and is dedicated to William N. Selig. It bears the copyright of Harold MacGrath.

Each copy of this de luxe edition bears on a fly leaf the autograph signatures, in order, of Kathlyn Williams, Charles Clary, Thos. Santschi, Francis J. Grandon, Harold MacGrath, Gilson Willets and Wm. N. Selig. This feature alone invests the gift with a sentimental value that will make every recipient cherish its possession.

Instead of engravings, the illustrations consist of sixteen full-page photographs—one of Miss Williams and the remainder taken from scenes in the photoplay serial—highly artistic and mounted on calendered light card paper. The photographs appear throughout the work in close connection with the text which they illustrate. The type, thank the publishers, is a gladsome sight for weak eyes.

"World" Advertisement Brings Business from China.

Mr. Felix Feist, general manager of the Celebrated Players' Film Co., this city, was pleasantly surprised by receiving the following letter, bearing the date of Sept. 11, from the Arcade Amusement Company, of Tientsin, China:

"From an advertisement on page 859, August 8th issue, of the Moving Picture World, we find that you have for disposal several features. We shall be greatly obliged if you will be good enough to quote us for the following films: 'Neptune's Daughter,' 'Brewster's Millions,' 'Sealed Orders,' 'Three Musketeers,' 'Message from Mars,' 'Rainey's Hunt,' 'Banker's Daughter' and 'Love Everlasting.'

"We have only two theatres at which we could show the films and, therefore, will appreciate it if you could supply us either second-hand or show copies at very cheap rates."

Manager Feist now considers the Moving Picture World an omnipresent salesman.

The city is billed from end to end, windows and elsewhere, with announcements of John Bunny's visit to the Auditorium, where he will make his first appearance in "Bunny in Funnyland," Saturday, Oct. 17. The newspapers announce that this is Mr. Bunny's round-the-world tour, in which he will be seen at the head of a company of fifty-one singers, actors, dancers and specialists. It is heralded that John will appear in two comic characters, and that he will sing, dance and be heard in a comic monologue, the latter treating of his experiences in film acting. "Cabiria," the remarkable photoplay which has been running steadily in Chicago since June, concluded its run last Saturday night, Oct. 10, when it was succeeded at the Ziegfeld by "The Nightingale." It will be remembered that "Cabiria" had a long run at the Illinois Theater before Alfred Hamburger secured it for the Ziegfeld. Mr. Hamburger estimates that over 150,000 people have seen the D'Annunzio masterpiece at the Illinois and the Ziegfeld. Ethel Barrymore takes the leading role in "The Nightingale," and as this is her first moving picture appearance, and seeing that she is a great favorite with playgoers in this city, the photoplay promises to be a fine attraction.

The first presentation of "Your Girl and Mine," the eight-reel melodramatic photoplay just finished under the auspices of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association, will be given at the Auditorium on Wednesday afternoon. This presentation will partake of the nature of a public as well as a private exhibition, as many exchange representatives and exhibitors throughout the city will be admitted free in order to judge of the financial and drawing powers of the subject, while the major part of the audience will be women of the city, who will pay admission. Mrs. Joseph T. Bowen, president of the Chicago Equal Suffrage Association, has already reserved a block of 100 seats, an example that is being followed by several other suffrage organizations. As soon as the big feature has passed the National Board of Censors it will be hurried into the seven states in which voters will cast the deciding votes this fall on the question of woman suffrage. Concurrently with its appearance in the states mentioned, as a campaign factor, it will be presented to the general public in the large playhouses of the big cities before being sent out on the smaller circuits. It is expected by Mrs. Medill McCormick and her associates that the subject will net a large amount in the interest of their cause.

BUNNY'S BEST BET.

SAWYER HAS A SPOONER PICTURE.

Sawyer, Inc., has secured the world rights to a four-reel picture featuring Cecil Spooner in "Nell of the Circus." It is a vivid drama of life under the "big top," and in its realism will be as great a joy to the fraternity of the ring and sawdust as it will be to the general public. Miss Spooner has a large following, and this will prove a pleasant surprise to them. It will be released in two or three weeks—just as soon as the elaborate advertising matter is ready for use by the exhibitor.

EXHIBITORS TO DANCE AT THE PALACE.

The fifth annual ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of New York will be held at the Grand Central Palace on December 15. Great preparations are being made for this event, and it is expected that it will be the largest in the history of the Association. The accommodations of the Palace are thirty thousand persons, and preparations are being made for the reception of this number. Last year the ball was held at the Terrace Garden. Fifteen thousand persons attended. Four floors of the Palace will be held in readiness so that everybody can have a chance of dancing and enjoying themselves with all comfort and every attention.

"CROSS IN THE DESERT" A "HOBO" STORY.

Carrying in its narrative a tremendously powerful object lesson to despotic officials, "The Cross in the Desert," a gripping story of hobo life recently completed at the Inceville studios of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, promises to create a sensation in photoplay circles. It relates the pathetic tale of a young man who, on the instructions of a veteran hobo, starts from the city to reach his dying wife in the west.

Under orders from the railroad superintendent he is forcibly ejected from the brakebeams and left to die on the desert. Some time later the superintendent—a victim of circumstances—is made to suffer the same fate. The story is splendidly told in the powerful acting of Walter Edwards, who also directed the production.

TOM INCE PRODUCING "ROMANCE OF OLD HOLLAND."

One of the most pretentious photoplay productions of recent years in point of costumes and scenery is soon to be released by Thomas H. Ince, of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, and will undoubtedly set a new standard of picturesque motion picture plays. It is entitled "A Romance of Old Holland" and teems with scenes of unrivaled beauty. While the story is replete with tense situations, the element of melodrama is not so overdone as to detract from the pretty love plot that is woven into the theme.

Staging of the production required more than a month. A number of the scenes are laid on the water and the Santa Monica Bay, on which Inceville is located, afforded splendid opportunity for this work. The story tells of the attempt of a vengeful Hollander to send a young fisherman to his death by allowing him to drift about helplessly at the mercy of a thick fog. Southern California's beautiful climate seldom sees a fog of long duration and on this account a serious obstacle presented itself in the nature of a long delay. Patience was rewarded, however, and the fog scene was made to the complete satisfaction of Mr. Ince and Director Jay Hunt.

David Bispham Heads New Company

The Gibraltar Films Has Opened Offices at 1600 Broadway and Announces Extensive Plans.

THE Gibraltar Films, headed by David Bispham, famous as an operatic star and producer, is the latest addition to the ranks of motion picture manufacturers. The first picture will be a photoplay form of the famous "A Message to Garcia," written by Elbert Hubbard. The author has written the scenario himself in collaboration with a well-known director from the Gibraltar Film staff, and the picture will be made in the localities of the story, with Mr. Hubbard playing the role of Lieutenant Rowan, the man who carried President McKinley's message.

A departure will be the film production of the dramatic stories of the popular operas. Thomas Quinlan, of the Quinlan Opera Company, of London, whose home is Covent Garden, and who has taken his company three times around the world in 2,600 performances of forty-two operas, was brought over from England with a view to securing his attractions for screen purposes. After the matter had been carefully figured over by experts, a contract was entered into by which Gibraltar Films acquires his scenery, costumes, effects and properties and the services of some of the artists who were under contract with Mr. Quinlan. War conditions had made Mr. Quinlan's operatic season an impossibility.

Another undertaking is the picturing of the Terriss plays. Thomas Terriss, known as the great impersonator of the characters in Dickens, has been playing in this country successfully the past three years. Mr. Terriss will have his own company with a special studio, and during the next two years will manufacture twelve plays, including such famous pieces as "The Mills of the Gods" and "A Man's Shadow."

Miss Adele Rey, who created the title role in Robert W. Chambers' "Iole," and who has played in Pathe and Thanhouser subjects, will also have her company.

David Bispham, the president, is known not only as a great artist, but as an excellent business man. Thomas Terriss is vice-president, Sydney Dalton, of the Academic Sinematographs, is secretary, and Herman Lingg is treasurer.

The corporation has taken the sixth floor of the Mecca building, 1600 Broadway, formerly occupied by Kinemacolor. The handsome projection room is now open to public rental. As the Gibraltar could not use all of this space, it was decided to draw in a number of other picture companies to participate in the unusual facilities.

M. H. Hoffman's Promotion

THE local exchange world was pleasantly surprised this week with the announcement of the appointment of M. H. Hoffman as general manager of the New York Universal Exchanges. Mr. Hoffman is a lawyer and a graduate of New York City College and New York University and practiced his profession in New York and New England for ten years before entering the film business. While an attorney, he became interested in a circuit of theatres and later W. E. Greene made him manager of his Springfield, Mass., film exchange. When the Universal Film Manufacturing Company took over the Greene Exchanges, Hoffman was made special representative for Universal in the middle west and then manager of the 33d Street, New York, Exchange. All told, it took Mr. Hoffman four short years to accomplish the success he has achieved in the film business.

M. H. Hoffman.

In his new duties he will have the supervision of the Mecca and 23rd Street Exchanges of the Universal; at the former branch he will be ably assisted by Emanuel H. Goldstein, and at the downtown branch by Sam Zierler. Mr. Goldstein was long in charge of the Newark office of the Universal, where he is succeeded by Lee Gainsborg. In addition to the metropolitan offices, the exchanges in Newark, New Haven and Springfield come under Mr. Hoffman's charge.

Crane With Famous Players

Prominent Comedy Star of the Legitimate Stage is Doing "David Harum" for Zukor's Company.

ALTHOUGH it has been announced by a certain other motion picture combination that one of its prospective subjects would be "David Harum" with William H. Crane in the leading role, it now transpires that the famous comedy star of the legitimate stage is actually at work in the studios of the Famous Players in pretentious production of "David Harum" to be released later by that company in the Paramount Program.

William H. Crane.

In securing Mr. Crane for a screen presentation of one of his most popular plays the Famous Players scored quite a triumph. Mr. Crane has for years resisted many attempts and refused large offers of real money to submit himself to the motion picture camera and it was not until the Famous Players consummated that notable arrangement with Charles Frohman by which it secured control of all the great Frohman dramatic successes was the way cleared to reach the star.

Those who have seen the stage play or have read the book will remember that "David Harum" is thoroughly American in his views and sentiments and exemplifies the typical American business man—keen in all commercial undertakings, unswerving from his purposes and principles, yet kind and generous to all who come in contact with him and secretly and quietly performing many humanitarian and sacrificial acts. The secondary element in the story is devoted to "David Harum's" aiding a helpless lad left penniless by his father to begin life's career, finally giving him not only business success but also the girl he loves.

WILLIAM H. TOOKER CAST FOR THE LEAD IN "SPRINGTIME."

The Life Photo Film Corporation's forthcoming release, "Springtime," a screen adaptation from the stage play by Booth Tarkington, is in active preparation. William H. Tooker, who played the lead in the prior releases of the company, will take the lead in this production. Mr. Tooker is one of the most versatile recruits from the ranks of the legitimate stage, having played more than nine hundred leading roles in the course of his twenty-two years experience in stock and legitimate productions.

As the result of his work in "The Greyhound" and "Captain Swift," Mr. Tooker has been inundated with offers from motion picture feature manufacturers, which offers have contained flattering inducement to Mr. Tooker to join their companies as leading man. Mr. Tooker is under a long contract with the Life Photo Film Corporation and will continue to take the leading male parts in their productions.

"WAR IN EUROPE."

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

Sawyer, Inc., is about to release four reels of pictures that it has just obtained from Europe, depicting various phases of the present European war. In assembling the picture great care has been exercised not only to avoid everything partisan that would be likely to militate against American neutrality, but also to insure as far as possible the absolute genuineness of the pictures shown. Many hundred feet of the negative received has been rejected and the rest has been carefully criticised by a number of experts. As a result of this careful editing the pictures not only bear out the claim made for them as to being the real thing, but they are full of human and heart interest touches that will make them a welcome among audiences of every kind.

"The Golden Beetle"

An Exciting Photoplay of Adventure in the Wilds of Hindostan, in Four Parts, Presented by George Kleine Through the Special Feature Department of the General Film Company.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

"THE GOLDEN BEETLE" is the first of a series of films of adventure that will be presented by George Kleine through the General Film Company. The story abounds in thrills of an unusual type, and the interest is continuous and strong up to the final climax. Unlike the familiar tale of adventure, which so often strains the bounds of credibility, "The Golden Beetle" lies constantly within sane lines. The atmosphere of Hindu mysticism, in which the plot and the incidents are mainly laid, has been successfully caught by the director. The ancient temple of Kali, in which the hero of the story is held prisoner, and the ruined palace where he has again been immured convey the atmosphere of locality vividly. The Hindu costumes worn by the supernumeraries, who appear as natives, also contribute to the same end. The grotesque idol in the temple, which contains the secret spring that reveals the dungeon of the prisoner, adds another strong touch of mystic realism.

The band of European desperadoes, which forms the clan in India known as "The Golden Beetle," is quite an original organization. The members are evidently the erring sons of good families from which they have become alienated by deeds of dishonor or crime. The strategy and daring of two of their number make the story possible.

George Surrey, a young Englishman, who is touring India, is arrested and held prisoner in the temple of Kali by fanatical natives. His parents and sweetheart in England are greatly alarmed because of his long silence, and a reward of $100,000 is announced in a Calcutta paper for news of him. Norton, a young English hunter, in India at the time, reads the advertisement.

One day a large eagle strikes against the bars of young Surrey's prison window. He seizes the semi-conscious creature and pulls it into the room. Then he hastily writes a note stating his condition, and fastens it to a foot of the eagle which has recovered from shock. He then releases the great bird and hopefully awaits the result.

Norton, when out hunting several days after the event, chances to shoot the eagle bearing the note. He sends his native servant to locate the temple. The servant is connected with the Golden Beetle clan and conveys the news of young Surrey to Raymond, chief of the clan. Raymond immediately plans to assist Norton in the rescue of Surrey and then to get rid of Norton and claim the reward for himself. He notices that a member of the clan, one Lang, has a striking resemblance to Surrey and decides to take him to England and restore him to the Surrey family as the missing heir. Surrey he imprisons in a stronghold and Norton he buries in a hole, with his head just above the ground, and leaves him as prey for the vultures.

Raymond and Lang succeed in reaching England and in deceiving the members of the Surrey family, who accept Lang as the heir to the Surrey millions. So well does the plan succeed, the day of the marriage of Lang to the real Surrey's sweetheart arrives without any suspicion on the part of the sweetheart or of Surrey's parents. On that very day, however, after many perils young Surrey and Norton arrive in England. On the same day Raymond receives a cable from a member of the clan in India advising him of the fact. He immediately plans to intercept the new arrivals and put them out of the way. He almost succeeds in bringing death to young Surrey; but, through Norton's exertions the two conspirators are arrested and the Surrey heir is restored to his sweetheart and his people.

The acting of the people in the principal roles is praiseworthy throughout, and the photography is very pleasing. The marine view from the island on which Norton and Surrey are wrecked is highly picturesque. The appearance of wild lions in the forest and underwood of this island, through which the shipwrecked men plod wearily, makes the scene most realistic. A fine interior scene shows the assembled guests in the Surrey home awaiting the marriage ceremony that will unite the false heir to young Surrey's sweetheart, and the arrival of the real heir and the arrest of Lang.

"Wildflower"

Marguerite Clark, Diminutive and Dainty, Gives a Delightful Performance in Famous Players' Four-Part Subject.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE introduction of Miss Marguerite Clark to picture-lovers is a most happy one. In "Wildflower," released by the Famous Players through the Paramount Program, we have a delightful subject. It is a production that charms as well as entertains; and there are dramatic moments, too, tense situations that add the leavening quality making for strength as well as lightness. The locale of the story is of the country and the city. Rural scenes predominate. Of the city we see only the finely furnished interiors of a mansion. The country is of a rolling section, of daisy-smothered fields, of brooks and of trim island dotted lakes. It is a most convincing background for the Wildflower. She is not childlike; she is a child, with the manners, the graces, the impulses and the grimaces of a child. If there be art in the mirth-provoking elevation of the elastic tip of her nose it is also life as we know it.

Scene from "Wildflower" (Famous Players).

Scene from "Wildflower" (Famous Players).

In the opening scenes we see Letty Roberts in her primitive surroundings meeting Arnold Boyd, a young man of wealth, who is camping out. Arnold is informed of the death of his father and hurries back to the city. There he learns also that his brother Gerald, something of a black sheep, has undesirably married. Gerald believes his brother has no knowledge of his union. Arnold takes his brother up to his camp, in the hope that the marriage can be broken. Gerald wins Letty and induces her to elope. The ceremony is performed before Arnold arrives on the scene. There is a fight between the two men and Arnold takes Letty to his home, where she remains until young Haskins comes from her home town and carries her back to her family. Later Arnold, again in camp, meets the Wildflower. Letty's marriage this time is a legal one and a happy one, too.

Miss Clark's work is marked throughout by clever touches. In her native surroundings, with her rabbits and puppies and the big doll given her by Arnold, she is truly a child of nature. When we see her set out for her elopement with her arms full of rabbit and doll we feel she is far from woman's estate. There are strong scenes when Arnold kidnaps the bride who is not a bride, and later confronts Gerald with the accusation of bigamy. There are situations of light and shade following Arnold's bringing Letty to his own home and his attempt to shield her by announcing her as his own bride.

Harold Lockwood is strong in the role of Arnold. James Cooley as Gerald adds to the effectiveness of the cast, and so, too, does Jack Pickford, who serves as the rural valet of Arnold. The script is an adaptation by Miss Eva Unsell in collaboration with Director Allen Dwan of the story of Mary Germaine. "Wildflower" is good to look on.

DISCLAIMER AS TO MISS TURNER'S RETURN.

The Moving Picture World is informed by those best qualified to make the announcement that there is no basis in fact for the recent report that Miss Florence Turner is to return to the United States to take up work for a new company. The declaration is made that the statement was unauthorized by the officers of the company. It will be recalled that this journal two weeks ago expressed its disbelief in the authenticity of the story. Miss Turner has for a year and a half been playing in England at the head of her own company, Turner Films, Ltd.

CO-OPERATIVE SERVICE ARRANGING FOR PROGRAMS.

Elmer Brient, manager of the Co-operative Service Company, the headquarters of which is in Indianapolis, has been in New York on business connected with his exchange. The Co-operative, which is capitalized at $100,000, will handle the releases of Sawyer and the Alliance Program, and, as soon as it may be ready, the Popular Program. The officers of the Co-operative are: President, F. N. Stevenson, of Indianapolis; treasurer, Harry R. Campbell, Indianapolis. The territory of the company is Indiana, Kentucky and Southeastern Illinois, and the output will be twenty-one reels weekly. Manager Brient is well known in his section, having been connected with various exchanges for four or five years.

STANDEE QUESTION PUZZLING PHILADELPHIA.

The question of how many patrons may stand in moving picture houses in Philadelphia is puzzling the department of Public Safety. The requirements are that no more than 10 per cent. of the house capacity can stand, but it is believed that this is being violated. An investigation may result in a change of the law in this respect. By direction of George Porter, director of the department, Chief Elliott, of the fire marshal's office, notified all exhibitors to remove the railings in the rear of the establishment. A cord was suggested in their place.

CASINO TAKES MICHIGAN RIGHTS FOR ALCO.

The Casino Feature Film Company of Detroit has closed a deal for the exclusive Michigan rights to all of the Alco films. This deal was effected on October 5, when George Trendle and John H. Kunsky, of the Casino company, were in New York City. This gives the Casino the Michigan rights to both the Paramount and Alco films. It has not been decided which theater in Detroit will have the first showing of the Alco films, but it will be either the Washington or the Liberty, which are the downtown houses of the Casino Amusement Company, a subsidiary organization, and which are now playing Paramount attractions.

MOVING PICTURES FOR SAFETY CAMPAIGN.

The Board of Commerce in Detroit is planning an extensive "safety first" campaign. The new campaign will not be one for the Board of Commerce and will not be a political affair, but will be a campaign of the people. The movement will be headed by the Board of Commerce and will be given aid by the automobile clubs of the city, the Detroit United Railway, the police department and automobile manufacturers. Motion pictures is one of the mediums suggested in the plan for publicity.

Doings at Los Angeles

THE most exciting incident of this week was the sensational arrest and detention in jail of Henry "Pathe" Lehrman. The ex-Keystone director was speeding to the station in his car when two motor policemen nabbed him, released him, renabbed him, and again let him go. When he thrice sped, the police made the film man walk to jail, where Judge Chambers kept him safely for the night. Friends approached with $10,000 for bail, but the judge said speeding must stop, and here was a chance to start the stop. Later Mr. Lehrman was sentenced to 30 days in jail. The last report was that the case would be appealed.

Larry Peyton, the giant leading man and director who was known under the Kalem colors and who lately directed for the United States Company, at San Diego, could not stand the two weeks lay off down south, so quit and came up here and will soon be at work again. Local players welcomed him back into the fold. Mr. Peyton says San Diego has just opened one of the finest theaters in the south, the Broadway, which is playing all the time to full houses, ever since the first Paramount release was shown. He reports business good in that city.

Just after Mr. Peyton arrived from the south, Bob Grey, of local fame, came in on a train from San Francisco, and told of the activities up there. He says the California company is doing well and putting on some big pictures. He reports that the theaters there are also running to good houses, and despite the people's habit of saying "hard times" they are spending freely. Mr. Grey told of a trip across the bay to Oakland, where the elegant new Franklin theater has just opened under the name Franklin Photoplay house. Business on the other side of the bay is good also.

We might say here that it will be appreciated greatly if exhibitors and people interested in the moving picture business in this part of the country write us of any newsy happenings in their vicinity. The theater men really interested in the business often have good stories right at their door, but the world at large does not get to appreciate them because they are not told. We aim to tell them, if they are worth telling, and it is hereby requested that the exhibitors, if they can scrape up time, write a short note whenever anything happens, whether it be amusing, a new wrinkle in advertising, or an event in the town. Send any such notes to Box 503, Santa Monica, Cal.

The Neptune theater at Venice, California's seaside resort, gives a book of car tickets most every night. The tickets are good between the beach and this city. Many commuters go to the show, the book of tickets being their coveted prize.

When Mr. Clune opened the Auditorium as a moving picture house, closing it as a grand opera and musical rendezvous, L. E. Behymer, the manager, was left out, but since the building of the magnificent Trinity auditorium it has been shown that two big theaters for films can thrive, for "Cabiria," Mr. Behymer's opening picture has been screened again and again to full houses. The new place seats 2,300 persons, and they're still clamoring for more.

She is famous from the "Money Moon" on the real stage. George Stanley played the male lead. Violet Malone is the new ingenue here, and W. V. Ranous came out to play characters. The "Captain Alvarez" director is now starting on "Chalice of Courage," another Brady story, which will be in five reels also.

Once more the Los Angeles Athletic Club auditorium was filled with enthusiastic fans who witnessed the first public run of "The Scarecrow of Oz," the latest production of L. Frank Baum. The story is so whimsical, and so quaintly curious, and the photography discloses so many new and novel features that the film is sure to be a winner. The company is starting on "The Last Egyptian," also from the typewriter of Mr. Baum, being its first dramatic production. It is a romance, and is interesting. The author spent three years on the banks of the Nile while writing it, so he will surely be able to put the punch of atmosphere into the picture. The property and scenic men have been working for four weeks on the preparation, and when filmed this story ought to be a headliner. Much building is being done at the plant.

CLARK IRVINE.

'FRISCO FILM MEN FORM PROTECTIVE BODY.

Representatives of more than twenty film exchanges engaged in business in San Francisco met in the offices of the Apex Feature Service in the Pantages Theater Building on the evening of October 1 to discuss plans for the formation of a protective organization. Lawyer Maurice L. Asher attended to the legal details and a temporary organization was formed. While no name has been definitely decided upon it was decided to conduct the association on the lines of a board of trade. Its purpose will be to protect the members from bad debts, to warn exchangemen of those who operate poor projection machines, and to regulate in some way the sale of posters. It is likely that it will be necessary to have an office and a secretary, in order to successfully carry out the plans. A committee to draft a constitution and by-laws was selected as follows: M. L. Markowitz, of the California Film Exchange; J. R. Crone, of the Pacific Mutual Film Corporation; Sol Lesser, of the Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc.; Tom North, of George Kleine Attractions, and O. V. Traggardh, of the Union Film and Supply Company. Another meeting will be held at an early date to effect a permanent organization.

WORLD FILM EXPANDING IN PITTSBURGH.

Leo F. Levison, manager of the World Film Corporation, Pittsburgh, Pa., is having extensive alterations made about his premises. The entire basement is being transformed into a mammoth poster department which it is expected will facilitate the handling of the large amount of advertising matter which goes with each release of his company. Improvements are being made for the accommodation of the increase in business.

THE EDUCATIONAL PICTURE.

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S.T.B.

Vitagraphs for October.

"THE Loan Shark King," to be released October 8th, is the story of a man whose business, unknown to him, inevitably and relentlessly destroys those nearest and dearest to him and whom he would have given his life to preserve and make happy. It is a good picture to bring to the attention of all who are engaged in social uplift and betterment work.

"The Cave Dwellers," to be released October 26th, is another of the Vitagraph's "Sonny Jim" stories and ought to be excellent on a children's program.

Edison for October.

This month Edison offers a number of things of educational value from several points of view. On October 9th it releases "The Long Way," a three-reel adaptation of the novel by Mary Imlay Taylor, a number of whose novels have already been done by the same company. The usual Buster Brown cartoons are released on October 12th and October 24th, and the twelfth of the Chronicles of Cleek series appears October 27th and the first of a new series of detective stories entitled "Below the Dead Line," originally published by Street & Smith, appears in "The Case of the Vanished Bonds," released October 17th. In addition to these, "On the Isle of Sarne," in two parts, is released as an adaptation from H. B. Marriott Watson's "The Picaroon," on October 16th, and two classic pieces of literature have been picturized.

The first of these is "Bootles' Baby," in two reels. This has already been done by an English firm in 1911 in one reel, but we have no hesitation in saying that not only is it high time it should be done again, but that we know of no company better able to do it properly than the Edison. Also they have shown their wisdom in taking two reels to tell the story as it should be told.

The other classic is "The Midnight Ride of Paul Revere," from Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's "Tales of a Wayside Inn." This has already been specially reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison in the Moving Picture World 22: 193, but both the review and the subject should be called to the attention of all schools and libraries, especially those teachers, librarians and others interested or engaged in studying English literature.

Interesting and Probably True.

We try to play "nix on the war discussion," but sometimes the other fellow has too much gift of gab and can turn our flank and make us retreat, and this time we did not feel sorry he was so persistent. We learnt a couple of facts that are good enough to pass along for what they may be worth.

One of them was that a good deal of the efficiency of the German army was due to the fact that systematic and technical instruction, by means of motion picture, as to erecting fortifications, making intrenchments, protecting lines of communication, operating signal stations, and first-aid to the injured has for the past two years formed a regular part of their work. If this is so we can heartily say, "Hoch der Kaiser," he is decidedly a wise man.

The other fact that we learned was that the British Admiralty started in about a year ago to instruct its officers on the effect of gunfire by means of the pictures. Our informant says that last November the obsolete battleship "Empress of India" was used as a target for experimental practice and that the results as recorded by the camera were shown to and criticised by the officers of the British navy. We also understand that similar uses of the kinematograph have been developed by the French. So we can also shout "Rah for the King" and "Vive le President."

Thanhouser Doings.

We understand that "The Trail of the Lovelorn," released by Thanhouser September 29, is in reality an educational on the subject of the mail order frauds. This would account for the criticism we heard the other day to the effect that the story interest was slight. This, if true, is a pity. The mail fraud evils are prevalent enough and abominable enough to warrant the most scathing denunciations and the subject affords abundant material for powerful dramatic exposition. You cannot bring this sort of thing home to people by a dry exposition. You must have a strongly dramatic story full of human and heart interest. Mere telling of the existence of an evil is not enough. You must also stir up a man's imagination and rouse his will so that he will realize how bad the evil is, how close it comes to home, and give him a personal interest in the matter that will make him get out and hustle for a better condition of things.

The same thing is true of the so-called "scenics." Many persons have to be taught to appreciate the beauties of nature and quite a number think geography a dull study. Once give them a personal interest in scenes and places and all is changed. Put the scenery into an interesting story and tell in the leaders what locations have been used and every time the spectator sees or hears of the scene again recollections and reminiscences will be aroused that will give him a personal interest in it. For the first time in history, Secretary of the Interior Franklin Knight Lane has granted permission for the staging of a picture in the Yellowstone Park. A Thanhouser company has been there all summer and the results will be released sometime in November or December. If the localities used as locations are properly emphasized in the leaders or the story the pictures will mark and inaugurate a distinct advance in the educational aspect and value of the photoplay.

Some Notes.

Through the courtesy of the Empress Theater of Shenandoah, Pa., the women's guild of the Epiphany of St. John's Episcopal Church gave a moving picture benefit at the theater on Thursday, September 24th. The women of the guild sold the tickets for the show before the date set and received a commission on every one sold. The funds raised are to be used in repairing the church, which was severely damaged by a tornado.

The First Baptist Church of Indianapolis, Indiana, which was built over fifty years ago and stands opposite the new Hotel Deming that is to be opened this month, has been purchased by Demas Deming, who will convert it into a moving picture theater, while the congregation will build a larger church building in a more residential section of the city.

Dr. Frank Crane, the secretary of the church and school social service bureau organized by Dr. William Carter last summer and allied to the Duke of Manchester's international education scheme, is one of the best-known editorial writers in the United States, and has written several books that have had a wide circulation. He was born at Urbana, Ill., in 1861, entered the Methodist ministry in 1882, was pastor in Chicago and Worcester, Mass., and in 1909, retired to take up his work as author and journalist.

The Rev. Frank B. Bachelor, as the representative of the Federation of Christian Workers of Ann Arbor, Michigan, has formally asked the council of that city to pass a law forbidding the operation of picture shows on Sundays, on the ground that although many cities in the state have Sunday moving picture shows, Ann Arbor is a different kind of a city. This sounds like a rather pharisaical and "holier than thou" sort of argument, especially as the petitioner emphasizes it by eulogizing Ann Arbor as the "city beautiful" and the "city of culture." Either the good minister is still enthralled by the old puritanical blue law notions of a generation or so ago, or he has a quite erroneous conception of pictures as they actually are and of their educational mission and possibilities. We cannot back him in the position he has taken; but if he will bend his energies to raising the tone and standard of the Sunday shows we will gladly co-operate with him.

50,000 Exposures a Second!

In a recent lecture before the German Engineers' Society, on the use of the moving picture in scientific and technical research, Dr. Hans Goetz describes the way in which pictures are taken in studying projectiles and their effect on armor plate.

"With the most refined mechanical devices," says Dr. Goetz, "it is not possible to take more than 250 pictures per second, but by illuminating the moving object with regularly succeeding electric sparks and photographing on a film that moves continuously rather than intermittently, it has been found possible to increase the number of exposures to 2,000 per second. In studying projectiles, however, much higher speed than this had to be used and the mechanical interrupter of the electric spark was replaced by a large condenser in series with the illuminating spark gap and a small condenser parallel with it. The large condenser is charged by an induction machine and when it is discharged the small condenser is alternately charged and discharged across the gap. The period of the alternations can be judged with fair accuracy by the tone, and since an explosion can take place in the one five-thousandth part of a second, the speed of from 9,000 to 50,000 exposures per second obtainable by this method furnish most interesting results."

Educational Comedies.

Very many persons have the idea that all stuff in order to be educational must be serious. Not at all. What about Pope and Dryden and Lamb and Hood and Mark Twain and all the rest of that crowd? A knowledge and appreciation of their works is considered an important part of every liberal education; and rightly so, because a sense of wit, satire or humor has often saved many a man from either the grave or the madhouse. This is the reason that God has given man the power to see the funny side of things, everything that helps a man to develop and exercise that power more highly and properly is educational. Education is nothing more than that which takes a man out of the old rut and puts him on a higher plane where he can be more of a perfect man than he was before. It may be only the stirring up of a higher ideal and purpose in some down-and-out, or it may be the extremely complicated and technical training of a man in a school of engineering or science. In both cases the aim is the same—to make the man a better man than he was before.

Good comedy has the same function to perform in photoplay that wit, humor and satire has to in literature, and very often we can enforce moral and social and other lessons much more effectively by showing up their funny side than we can by whole volumes of books or miles of strictly dramatic stories. Moreover, nowadays, the local censor man seems to be doing his utmost to kill every drama that has even a point, to say nothing of an educational point to it, so why not fool them. When we come to a wall that has no gate to it, and that we cannot climb over or crawl under, we naturally walk around it. The past year has a record for more piffle and absurd nonsense labeled comedy than has any of its predecessors; but there have been recently several notable exceptions, such as some of the George Ade Fables put out by Essanay, the Buster Brown cartoons released by Edison, and the recent Vitagraph picture "The Royal Wild West." Why not have more of this kind of comedy with a point and a punch and an educational value and less of the asininities that only make people tired and disgusted? It will pay in every way. We know, because we have gotten more checks for pointing our lessons by comedy than by drama. Once we pointed a moral by a tragedy. We have the story yet, and it has been turned down about thirty times. Meanwhile we have spent the checks we received for about a dozen stories all pointing the same moral by means of comedy.

PROGRESSIVE EDUCATIONAL NOTES.

Twenty public schools in and around New York City are to have moving picture machines of the Pathescope make, presented to them by the New York Tribune upon the result of a popular vote using coupons cut from the daily issue of that paper. Ten of these machines are to go to ten schools within the city limits, the other ten to be divided between public schools adjacent to the city and parochial schools. This is a plan which might profitably be copied by publishers in all the large cities of the United States. While boards of education are busily engaged "marking time" let the newspapers with their accustomed energy and progress force the matter by following the example of the New York Tribune and get the moving-picture educational work started, not in isolated schools but in a large number at once; such a beginning will soon cause such a demand from the other schools—for what one school possesses all the others must have—that it will not be long before the use of the moving picture in the class room will become general. Great credit is due to the enterprise of the New York paper for this beginning.

"To-day's" a popular "Magazine for Women," well known all over the United States, recently held a contest among its readers for the best letters critcising the paper, with a view of further increasing its efficiency. The letter winning the first prize was from a lady reader who entitled her letter "Progress and Efficiency," laying down seven rules with that object in view; we reprint here her rule No. Four: "Establish a moving picture department. Every household now talks about the 'movies,' their favorite actors, etc." Two important things are noticeable about this section of the winning suggestion. First, "every household now talks about the movies," this is a splendid yet deserved tribute to the widespread power of the moving picture. Second, that because of this popularity, any periodical that aspires to "progress and efficiency" must have its Moving-Picture Department. It may not be possible or wise for every publication to devote space to the moving picture; there is no doubt, however, that the leading journals and magazines must now of necessity be abreast of the moving picture times; this is especially essential with all such papers intended to be of educational importance.

We have had pictures of the earth taken from the heights of the flying machine, now this is reversed and pictures are forthcoming of the flying machine taken from the earth. In Atlantic City a few days ago some new and valuable tactics of the aeroplane by Aviator Jacquith were especially performed for kinematographic purposes. While pictures of the aeroplane are now somewhat common the recent valuable uses of the air machines in Europe have increased the interest in the great possibilities and capabilities of these aerial helps. Future pictures therefore must be of an increased scientific and educational nature or we do not need them. We are now living in times when every new invention or discovery must lost its first interest and replace it with proofs of its utilitarian and educational nature; along these lines we cannot have too many pictures.

Education requires facts not "features." There are no real "War-Pictures," yet at least. Complaints are frequent that many so called war pictures are such evident fakes and money getters. Pathe's weeklies and similar topical films are the only safe pictures for the present. Scenes from the after effects of the war will soon begin to appear, but care must be taken that they are by responsible firms and so well authenticated. It is an injustice to the schools to allow misleading pictures, there is no room for "Yellow" or untrue sensational war pictures in educational kinematography.

M. MANNIST MANAGING THE REX, CALGARY.

M. Mannist writes in from Calgary that he has disposed of his interests down East and moved to the Alberta country. Down east in this instance means Port Arthur, 900 miles northwest of Ontario, where Mr. Mannist managed three houses. He is now directing the Rex, the entire profits of which are given weekly to the Colonel Macleod Chapter, Independent Order Daughters of Empire. Mr. Mannist says he has a fine house, government owned, and probably the only theater in the country where every dollar earned goes to a benevolent object. He reports business conditions as bad in Canada this year. The war has put a crimp in things, he says, and it will be surprising if there are not a lot of theaters on the market when the new licenses are payable at the first of the year.

Warner's Features has just opened an office in Calgary. Joseph Partridges, in the interests of the World Film Corporation, was in Calgary a fortnight ago looking over the territory.

EACO TO RELEASE THROUGH P. P. CRAFT.

The Eaco Films, with Edwin August as the star, has signed contracts with P. P. Craft, of the Apex Film Company, with offices at 145 West Forty-fifth street, to handle exclusively the Eaco releases in the United States and Canada through the Strand Film Company channels, and likewise with J. Simmonds, who represents H. Winik, of 35 Little Newport street, London, W., England, who will control the foreign rights. Mr. August, who is one of the officers of Eaco Films, in addition to acting and producing his three-reel features will supervise the production of the single-reel western and comedy companies.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

A PORTION of the United States Senate's time was taken up about a week ago by a discussion over motion pictures, the only result being that the maker of the films which led to the debate got a considerable amount of advertising at the taxpayers' expense. It appears that an enterprising motion picture man succeeded in getting his camera into the Senate Chamber while the Senate was not in session, although a number of Senators were in their seats; and, subsequently, a Senator made protest against the taking of the pictures. For a time all regular business the Senators are paid to transact was laid aside to try and appease the Senators who felt the dignity of the Senate had been offended by the supposed intrusion of the motion picture man. The debate became quite heated. The Committee on Rules said one of the most solemn rules of the Senate had been violated by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and that official defended himself by stating that the photographer had authority from the Vice-President to take the pictures. The Vice-President said that, in giving his consent, he thought the Rules Committee had also been consulted and had granted permission. He felt that an undue attempt had been made to criticise the chair and instructed the Sergeant-at-Arms to see that the pictures taken were not used. Later in the day the Senator who made the original protest addressed the Senate, stating that a mistaken impression had led to it and the Vice-President and Sergeant-at-Arms were exonerated of intention to violate the rules. It has since been learned that the motion picture man is to be allowed to use the pictures after the Rules Committee has had an opportunity to censor them.

So there is the first instance on record where the United States Senate was held up by a motion picture man and the once despised motion pictures were dignified with the distinction of being a sole subject of discussion before the Senate. The photographer is immensely satisfied. He has secured the best endorsement of his pictures as to their genuineness and has every reason to congratulate himself. Still photographs of the United States Senate in session have been made many times without protests being offered, and if the motion pictures were taken in violation of any rules the matter could have been adjusted in committee and through the Sergeant-at-Arms without interrupting the regular business of the Senate. Some people think the photographer put a clever one over on the Senate. Others think the protesting Senators are of the old guard, opposed to motion pictures at all times, and that the arrangement made to have the Rules Committee censor the pictures before they are used is a crafty step to have a precedent of Federal censorship. At all events, the result of the whole proceeding show a waste of time for everybody except the man who owns the pictures.

The Senate incident calls to mind one which recently occurred in this city. A camera man placed his apparatus in front of a religious institution to get a scene to be used as a part of a photoplay. The clergyman in charge rushed from the place and threatened to demolish the camera if it was not taken away. It was explained that no harm could be done, as there were no services in the place at the time and it was intended to take only exterior views of the buildings. Apology was also offered for failure to first secure the clergyman's consent, although it was explained this was not thought necessary as the views were to be taken from the street and no intrusion would be made upon the grounds. The clergyman replied that he did not care what the intention was or what the picture was to be; that he was unalterably opposed to motion pictures and at no time would he be a party to or allow any place under his control to be made a part of any such pictures. Of course his wishes were respected and the motion picture people sought another location for what they wanted.

An instance to the point was cited by an official when a well-known and reputable picture company sought the use of the building in his charge. "I am very sorry," said he. "You people are all right, I know, and have used the place before; but others who have come here have been so defiant and persistent that permits must now be secured and that will delay you a few days." It appears that, on a plea of expense, interlopers had practically stolen use of the place, regardless of the owner's wishes. There is much bitter complaint about such people, and their actions have rebounded upon themselves with more effect than it has affected the responsible concerns.

Roy L. McCardell, of the New York World, is responsible for the statement that an owner of sightseeing automobiles complains that one of the reasons for his loss of business is that "Every buttonhole maker that used to butt into the motion picture game has traded his movie show for an auto truck and put seats on it." Oh, wouldn't it be joyful if such were really the case! It is the "buttonhole maker" who is THE bane to the motion picture business. He started out in the "store" show and has never attained sufficient intelligence or ambition to get above it. His policy can be identified by the displays made at the entrance to his place. He appeals to and relies upon the maudlin class of people. But for his existence legitimate producers and exhibitors would never be put upon the defensive with the authorities. His policy is cheapness and a struggle for the nickel regardless of how he gets it in the eyes of the law and the legitimate people in the business.

After a visit to the Academy of Music a few nights ago the writer stopped in a neighboring cafe and restaurant, and during conversation with the man in charge remarked, "Fox seems to be doing well with his new style of show." The man scratched his head for a moment, as if in reflection, and then said, "Well, it is not because I am in this line of business that I think otherwise, but I do not think he is doing as well as when he had stock there. You see, when he had that kind of a show, people would go early to get seats and then come in here and while away the time until the show was ready to start. I had a big trade from ladies without escorts, and some with their children, who like to have a little drink in some quiet place. Between the acts the men would come, and after the show I had quite a trade from all of them. But since this motion picture, vaudeville and sketch stuff has been put in I have lost nearly all that trade. You see, with this moving picture game the people walk in and out of the theater any old time during the afternoon and evening, and when they come out they go right home, or some other place. I don't get them. I knew just who to expect in here every afternoon and evening. They were a nice class of people. They were good for thirty or forty cents apiece. No, I don't think the Academy is doing as well now."

On the night this conversation took place there was a large audience in the Academy. The house is a big one, too. To make a fair-sized audience in it takes some people. Mr. Fox says his new show scheme is doing well. If such is not the case he may justly lay claim to the support of the reform element on the plea that his new undertaking has reduced the number of ladies without escorts and with children who like to take a drink in some quiet place. By the way, the condition of affairs as presented by the cafe man confirms the reports that motion pictures have done a great service for the temperance movement and other reforms in taking people away from saloons and like places.

The press, which so complacently viewed the troubles of the motion picture people while strenuous efforts were being made to bring them under the ban of official censorship, now have similar troubles of their own to handle. The Brooklyn Bar Association wants a law passed restricting the latitude of publications concerning proceedings about to be instituted in, or pending, in the courts. It is claimed some publications have prejudiced the public and impaired the efficiency of the courts. On the other hand, the newspapers claim the action is an attempt to muzzle the press. Motion picture people are taking a deep interest in the matter as it involves the same question of constitutional privilege as that involved in their fight against official censorship. Political and other cartoons, if not the same end achieved in writing place the newspapers and motion pictures on the same level, "Sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." If the newspapers make as good a fight as the motion picture people have and win out, it will go a long way towards relieving the motion picture industry of one of its greatest troubles. If the Bar Association wins, the press will be practically under censorship for the reason that any publication of the kind complained of will subject the publishers to contempt of court proceedings. The only difference is that in the motion picture game the authority is exercised before publication.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Looks Like Exclusives.

EVIDENTLY the news columns have beaten us to it, but we read with interest that the Sherry company announces that Mike Shea has taken the Paramount service exclusive for Buffalo. Outside the time he "fell for" the dirt carts that went past his place from the Keith excavation (possibly he remembers the time himself) he has never gained much of a reputation as a purchaser of gold bricks, and that he evidently is willing to pay added money to get specials exclusive to his own use in Buffalo argues that we are coming at last to the exclusive film. It is, perhaps, the answer to the important question as to what shall be done when makers turn out twice as much stuff as a normal market will absorb. It is not altogether unlikely that we are entering on the domain of the exclusive film, a feature that has run so far with our English cousins that they now insist that the exclusives be good exclusives, and it might perhaps be well to issue a word of caution as to the over-enthusiastic acceptance of the "exclusive" just because it is called such. This does not, of course, apply to the Paramount, which sets a certain standard and can keep to that standard, but presently the man who has a feature —any old feature -he cannot dispose of in any other fashion, will label it "exclusive," and sell it to you at an increased price, to be shown only in your house within a radius of a stated number of miles. The Paramount is feature stuff, we know that from the disinterested reports from various parts of the country. To have the only house where such reels can be shown is going to make money for the holder, but because Mike Shea makes money with that, it is not to be argued that any exclusive will make similar money, so if you are able to afford the luxury of an exclusive, do not get carried away by the new idea and book wildly. Make certain that the stuff is a feature and that the product of the contract will all be of approximately equal merit. Don't fall too hard for the new idea unless you carry a nice, soft cushion of useless money in your hip pocket. If you lived a couple of centuries ago you may remember when prize tulip bulbs were almost worth their weight in gold. If you cannot trace back that far perhaps you can remember when a prize Belgian hare was worth a few hundred dollars for stud. You can get bulbs as low as a penny each and Belgian Monarch, were he alive today, would be just a plain rabbit. The exclusive idea is a good one, in moderation, but there are seven or nine exhibitors—perhaps more—who are not going to make their everlasting fortunes with it.

It is worth an appreciable amount of money to be able to run a big story today and not feel that a cheap man down in the next block will run precisely the same strips of film you had, only a few weeks later, for one-tenth the admission price you charged. It is worth important money to announce that nowhere else in Buffalo, or Omaha or wherever you may be, can the same subject be seen, if it is the sort of subject that attracts attention, but be guided by the subject and not merely by the fact that it is an exclusive. It will not be the exclusive that will make the subject worth while, but the subject that will make the exclusive worth while.

And, as we said earlier, with a proper number of markets, there will be a better general market for the big stuff generally, and so the business will be better for all.

And to quote from the Sherry bulletin, "Mr. Shea plans a gigantic advertising campaign," which would not be so cheerfully started if some small house also got the profit from the money Mr. Shea will spend. The old-time theatrical men are coming into the picture end faster than ever. It behooves the old-timer to get up to date and meet the more alert competition.

Still They Come.

A certain person by the name of Block assuredly did start something when he told about showing Quo Vadis. If this keeps up we'll have to be told of Quo Vadis and Cabiria the same evening in a town of 300 at $5 admission to be interested at all.

F. E. Hughart, of the Eagle theater, Grand Junction, Iowa, writes:

> I wish to say that I am a careful reader of your "Advertising for Exhibitors" section of the Moving Picture World. I was very much interested in the article by Manager Block of Beaufort, N. C., on page 1232 of the issue of August 29th, regarding his exhibition of Kleine's "Last Days of Pompeii." Since the island of Iowa is included in the U. S., I feel I must stand up and be heard.
> Grand Junction is a town of 1,012, and I presented Kleine's "Last Days of Pompeii" on the 18th of June also. I started readers in our local paper about six weeks before our date of showing and used every reader in Kleine's copy, some of them twice. Two weeks before showing I put in about a quarter page ad and the following week I put in a half page. On the 15th I got a touring car and put up the top and then covered the back and sides, also the hood, with suitable posters and other advertising. I took 2,500 heralds and a bugle and drove to all the surrounding towns distributing them. When we entered a town we whooped up the bugle and the people thought a circus had arrived. We covered 90 miles during the day. On the night of the 18th we burned red fusees on the building and in the street in front of the theater. I had the best orchestra in this part of the country.
> It may be interesting to know that one industrious individual counted 122 autos besides 50 teams and the regular townspeople. I am a firm believer in the quotation, "It Pays to Advertise."
> We had a picture taken of our Pompeii display but it was no good. I am enclosing a post card of The Eagle taken later, which you may do as you like with. I am also forwarding you under separate cover an issue of our paper with the above mentioned half page ad, together with a sample of the heralds mentioned and an interesting clipping or two.

The feature was shown at 15 and 25 cents. The herald is the regular Kleine herald and the advertising followed the Kleine press sheet. One of the clippings, however, is decidedly interesting. It runs:

> The crowd in town last Thursday night brought it home to a number of our citizens that the moving picture theater is a business asset to a town. A movie house under aggressive management has considerable drawing power within a town's trade territory. The fact is, we are all working together to make a good trading town.

It is something when you make people realize that a photoplay theater is an asset The Eagle, as will be seen from the cut, is not a very pretentious house, though it is by no means a "hole-in-the-wall," but it is big enough to match the size of the town and then a little, and evidently it is a local institution and a business help. Another clipping estimates that 1,500 persons were on the business street that day.

Another claimant is M. Jobbe (the name is not quite clear) of Kenyon, Minn., a town of 1,200. He has not only shown "Quo Vadis," but "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Antony and Cleopatra," and "For Napoleon and France." "Antony and Cleopatra" opened at the American, Chicago, February 1. It was shown in Kenyon March 1, at 25 cents admission. Minneapolis got the reels in May. Mr. Jobbe says he has played not only all of the Kleine features, but some of the Lasky and other star reels and has no trouble getting a quarter for them. Think of that, some of you who apologize for an extra nickel.

Seven Years.

The Orpheum theater, Fond du Lac, Wis., is celebrating its seventh anniversary. The souvenir program is a simple four pager that is certainly not pretentious, though good looking. For the big noise they could get nothing better than a newspaper write up of August 10, 1913. Possibly they have done nothing whatever in the last year, but even at that they should at least have rewritten the story to seem to bring it down to date. At the very least they could have said that the item was from the Daily Reporter without adding "of a year ago," as the date line clearly shows.

Over on the next page they run this:

> Messrs. Prinsen and Martin have made every possible effort to elevate the Photoplay to a stage and status hitherto esteemed far beyond plausible reach! they have fought a sincere and relentless battle against every element and influence inimical to the art. They have striven with grim purpose to create for the Photoplay a nobler sentiment, a broader appeal and a deeper sympathy. Ambitious struggle and indefatigable effort have resulted in a vast victory, a thrilling triumph that is best exemplified by the announcement that the management of the Orpheum has arranged for the presentation in photo-drama of the world's most popular and famous stars. Prominent among the first few are:

We bet they hired someone to write that and it was written with no other desire than to get something flashy that would seem to be worth the money. "Ambitious struggle and indefatigable effort" sounds better than "we have done our durndest" and yet the latter would sound more sincere and be more convincing.

There are times when it is all well enough to talk like a circus press agent writing a herald, but there are other times when it is better to speak simply and sincerely in the same sort of talk that common people use. One of those times is when you are telling what you have done, and propose to do and are asking the support of the patrons. They are more likely to give their support to sincere endeavor than to indefatigable effort. Write what is in your heart when you want to reach the hearts of your patrons. You can get them more quickly because you can be more convincing, not to say more readily understood.

They dress their house nicely, but no one out there seems to know how to write. One of the features, for future week, for instance, announces "Blanche Sweet" (The Sweetest Girl in Pictures) and "Dorothy Gish" (The Prettiest Blonde in the World). That is not going to coax many persons into a house, because it does not ring convincingly.

"Clothes," the feature advertised in the photograph, is "the play that startled Metropolitan Society" and Margarita Fischer appears in "a masterpiece in the art of pantomime."

Of course the answer to all this is that they have been open for seven years and are still going, but perhaps they might have done even better with a good advertising man.

A Real Folder.

John F. Davied, of the Cinema, Cynthiana, Ky., sends in a real folder he got out for the "Million Dollar Mystery." It is five and a half by fourteen inches, folded over on itself in four parts. The top part discloses the familiar story of the young man and his Bible. This is all you see:

> On leaving for college a young man promised his mother to read each night from the Bible she gave him—but he did not. On his return he handed the Bible to his mother, assuring her he had faithfully kept his promise. His mother opened it and found the $10 bill she had previously placed in it—AND MANY A TIME HE HAD BEEN BROKE.

This is all you see until you unwrap another length and get the rest.

Nervous, Evidently.

August 29th, Harold S. Vahl sends in some copies of Reel-ism, put out by the Orpheum, Nampa, Idaho. September 2nd his partner, E. E. Sharp, writes: "Some time ago we sent you copies of Reel-ism and have been anxiously watching the Advertising for Exhibitors ever since." Time must fly in Nampa, or else it's a frightfully nervous town. Mr. Vail says that Reel-ism costs $6 for 500 and surely brings in more than a dollar a day. Mr. Sharp adds that any exhibitor who wants one has only to send the request and a stamped envelope.

We are glad that both sent in rather than neither. An earlier submission is probably what Mr. Sharp has reference to. We do not recall the date, but mention was made of the first lot. It is a nice looking four pager with at least one kicker in every issue. One line runs:

> Five or ten cents is nothing to pay for an act of vaudeville. It's the way a fellow feels to have to sit and listen to the rot of some guy who is too lazy to work.

That hits the picture-vaudeville situation very nicely. Here is the way they handle advanced prices:

> Have you ever heard your neighbor grumble a little because the tendency in the picture show business is toward a slightly higher admission price? If so did you take the trouble to tell him why? Or did YOU know why? He argues that a picture show is a picture show and that he ought to be able to buy it for ten cents. He probably never stopped to consider that a little while ago a picture show for which he paid his little dime consisted of THREE reels of old, scratched, rainy, blurred, dilapidated film that ought to have been on the junk heap. To-day for that price we give him FOUR REELS of new, bright, clean, up-to-the-minute pictures that are carefully chosen from the output of the best studios of the entire world. Sometimes we add a high priced special feature that adds much to the quality and usually to the quantity, and charge him an extra nickel or dime for something he would have paid 50c, 75c or a dollar to see in New York—for Moving Pictures are the only commodity that is cheaper in the West than in the East. Funny isn't it.
> Now this neighbor of yours wouldn't expect one of the Nampa stores to sell him two bushels of new potatoes for the price of one bushel of last year's crop. Oh, no, nothing of the kind. But he does expect the picture show to do just that with the commodity it has to sell. Funny, isn't it?

Rather startling is another line that runs:

> We are much indebted to Mr. and Mrs. van de Steeg for getting married. Won't some one else please follow suit?

In an earlier issue, however, it is explained that they are local people who were married before the camera at some state affair, the pictures being shown by the house. They also ran a formal "invitation" to the wedding. By and large it is a readable sheet with a day and date program on the third page, where it properly belongs, and enough good reading to keep people reading it. They could raise it to eight pages, with the same stuff, get enough outside advertising to pay the expense and brag about their growth.

Sticks to the State.

S. A. Arnold has moved again, this time to a house he says is next best to the Strand, and he shows photographs to prove it. We give here the exterior. The interior views have been passed along. We feel certain one will delight Mr. Richardson, who likes projection rooms instead of booths, and this room is no booth. It is the Palace theater, Little Rock, Arkansas, and the place is quite a little larger than Mena, and we think Mr. Arnold will be doing proportionately greater things. It was some stunt to get a sign like his across the street, if that is any of his doings. The house is owned by a large mercantile firm. Mr. Arnold writes:

> This house was opened June 1, is using Mutual pictures, and enjoying a satisfactory business.
> We take in quite a bit of territory when I say outside of The Strand in New York City it is the finest theater in the United States, but we can prove it.
> It is fireproof, equipped with perfect cool air system and all modern conveniences. It has a seating capacity of 1,200. The dimensions of the building are 50x150, built at a cost of $100,000. It has a spacious and perfectly appointed reception room for ladies, smoker for gentlemen, ice cold water is furnished through sanitary drinking fountains, has 32 exits, large pipe organ, some of the features being electric action, 30 stops, 2,350 pipes, Vox Celeste stop.

$10,000 for You.

Then you're interested and you'll read the rest of the advertisement to find out what it's all about.

Another catchy advertisement is a fake "special dispatch" announcing the disappearance of a society bud, the same being the Mutual Girl. Mr. Davied states that these were distributed by the boys who carry the evening paper putting one in each paper delivered. That may be a good plan in Kentucky, but we fired one newsdealer for doing that, and lots of others feel the same way about it. It is not only an aggravation to the man who wants a newspaper and not a collection of stuff, but gives the suggestion that the theater is either too poor or too stingy to use the advertising columns and yet is trying to "ring in." Most advertising of that sort reacts against the house.

Backing Down.

The Third Street theater, Easton, is backing down, at least they are backing their rear wall down thirty feet to get more seating capacity. It does not look as though business could be so very poor in Easton. To keep all the money in the family, they are running the Neumeyer as a three day house, showing two big features a week for three days each. Now after we have been that nice to them, will they please go across the street and explain to the printer that Shakspeare's hero does not (or rather did not) spell his name MacBETH, as set forth in the advertisement for September 12.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

The Inquest Club.

LONERGAN, of the Thanhouser editorial force; George Ridgewell, of the Vitagraph script staff, and Paul Scardon, of the Vitagraph players, were the star witnesses at the Second Inquest for this season at Keene's Chop House and the Savoy theater, Monday, October 5. At the Savoy the bill had been changed from Licensed to Universal service, with Our Mutual Girl as an added feature, and the jury found comparatively little food for comment in the Mutual Girl and Imp's Shadows, the former being merely a scant story to carry certain features, while in the Imp double exposures replaced technical construction in the slight story. It was generally agreed that Smidt's Mistake was some shades worse than Romaine Fielding's The Laziest Man and that the spectacle of a man climbing out of his coffin through several feet of earth was not precisely comedy material. It was pointed out that many persons suffering comparatively recent bereavements probably could not see the exquisite humor of clods falling upon a coffin at the bottom of a grave. The Victor Disillusioned, a Kerrigan, was about the only chance for discussion and here was commended the skill with which the producer evaded the sorry spectacle of betrayal by a single hospital scene. Just to keep him from getting too proud it was remarked that the first scene was far too long and not sufficiently explanatory.

Mr. Lonergan in his well chosen remarks contended that there was plenty of room for improvement in script writing and, in reply to a question, explained that the way to have a script produced as written was to write it as it should be produced. He treated interestingly on many points of technique, his most interesting statement being that he had found most directors willing to work with authors and the editorial staff if only they were given proper material.

Mr. Ridgewell announced that in spite of statements to the contrary, the Vitagraph company was still in the market for really good scripts; matter better than that obtained through the Sun contest, though it was at no time in need of mediocre stuff. He also announced that Vitagraph would purchase synopses without the plot of action as most of the Vitagraph stories were done from reconstructions. Being questioned as to the value of this slipshod method of working, he admitted that it was a poor plan to do only the synopsis, but explained that the story was the thing principally desired by the Vitagraph. He also made a telling point in regard to the scene plot, telling how the average director appreciated a story in which comparatively few interior sets and exterior locations were used.

Mr. Scardon said he had been under some twenty-five directors in his four years with the independents, and gave an experience under one director. It was quite sufficient, but it drove home the point he sought to make that the player can, if he is intelligent, materially aid a production by the creation or suppression of business.

Carl Gregory came in late, but did not speak, having done his share at the first meeting. Mrs. Gregory was also present.

The next Inquest will be held Monday, October 19, meeting at the Savoy and adjourning to Keene's as usual. Several new members were present last Inquest and all who are interested in photoplay will be welcome. There are no formalities. It is sufficient that you present yourself at any meeting.

"Spec" Objects.

Frank Woods (Spec) objects to a recent paragraph stating that he had turned down stories because they had previously been rejected by another company, and writes that if he made that statement it was intended as a joke. We'll confess that we're glad to know it was a joke, for we like Spec too well to want to think him narrow. To clinch matters he adds that he is not guided by rejection in his own reading, so that the tory is good.

Philadelphia.

Will the Philadelphia Coroner please send in his address again? In some manner his card has been mislaid and there are several prospective members waiting to hear from him.

New Baltimore Coroner.

Owing to the inability of A. E. Sommerwick to take charge of the Baltimore Inquest Circle this season, J. M. Shellman has been appointed Coroner. The first session of the season was held Sept. 26. A return cover will bring Mr. Shellman's address to any person desiring to join the Circle, which, by the way, did excellent work last season.

Hartigan Hopes.

At the Inquest the other evening one of the members displayed a note received from Mr. Hartigan saying that he hoped to resume the making of films shortly and was holding scripts against that time. Just why he presumes to retain the property of other persons on the off chance of getting into the game some time, he does not explain.

Something Good.

We don't know where they got it from, but the Third Street theater, Easton, Pa., sends in a gem in its way. It is a cut-out advertisement for the film "The Old Curiosity Shop." It shows, in brown on pink the building supposed to have been the original of the Dickens story. The roof lifts to let you open the folder and read about the film, but no lover of Dickens is going to let this picture get by him without going into the volume of Dickens to which it belongs, and it will serve a perpetual reminder of the house. We think that the Third Street merely picked up an idea put out by the makers of the film, but the makers of the film must have had the entire staff sworn to secrecy. It is a capital picture of the building as we remember it, and it is worth booming. It might have carried a line to the effect that it is a picture of the original. There is nothing in the folder to indicate this, the only point in which it falls short. Sometimes we wonder the Third Street does not get pinched for exceeding speed limit. They certainly are going fast.

Be Definite.

It pays to be a little careful in writing stories. Scene nine may show a man getting a black eye and scene ten may show the owner of the eye being thrown out of the house. The director may make the ejection before he makes the interior scene, and although ten follows nine on the same page, and he has read the story, he may forget for the moment that Smithers is supposed to be all mussed up. If you put it in scene ten you put it where he will see it when he starts to make scene ten. Instead of writing it this way:

9—Dining room Jones and Green arguing with Smithers. Jones hits Smithers in the eye—Green and Smithers clinch—Green tears Smithers' coat—Jones rips Smithers' collar and necktie off—they run him out of scene.

10—Front of house—Jones and Green throw Smithers out—re-enter house—Smithers gets up—runs off—

Write scene ten more like this:

10—Front of house Smithers dressed as in the end of No. 9 is thrown from house by Green and Jones—they re-enter house—Smithers exits.

Now when the director comes to make the scene he is reminded, right in that scene, that Smithers is all mussed up, and so he'll dress him that way. Of course the director should remember, without being told, what comes before scene ten, but he has a lot of others things to remember and it is not very remarkable that now and then some detail such as this escapes him.

Where Are They?

Someone wants to know what has become of a lot of the people who were prominent in script writing two or three years ago.

We do not think that many of them have dropped out, but there are some old timers we do not hear of. There is S. Walter Bunting, for one. He wrote last that he was doing very little. Hugh King Harris is another who seems to have dropped out. Guy T. Evans seems to be keeping quiet for a long time, and the list might be extended to some length.

Let's have an Old Home Week. Drop in again, if only just for a chat, not only you who have been named but the rest of the early birds. Even in so new a business as photoplaywriting it seems there are those who have gone into the fields and pastures new. Some of them did not quite make good. Others found new vocations more to their liking. Where are you, old timers?

Inverse Ratio.

We've noted that the longer an author keeps at it, the less certain he is that he is writing good stuff. The novice is positive that his stories are the best ever. The more he gets to know about writing the more certain he is that he is not as good as he thought he was, and when he gets to the point where he knows that his work is not good, he stands a chance of getting good. The greatest obstacle to the success of the beginner is the complacency that makes him content with incompetent work. The old hand knows that he might write a hundred stories and turn out a poor one the hundred and first try. A sound pride in your own work is a good thing, and the man who has not that pride cannot do his best work, but there is a difference between a decent pride and an overwhelming egotism.

Reliability.

It's a great thing to know your business thoroughly. The other day a man came into the office, tinkered a bit with a typewriter fresh from the factory and went away, so we requested that a regular man be sent up. The man took about ten minutes in which to do what the other man had spent half an hour trying to do. One knew his work and the other merely got through the best he could. It is the same way in photoplay writing. If you know your work, if you are thoroughly grounded, you not only do better work, but you do it in less time, and there is something about the way you get your story down on paper that tells the editor that you know your business and he is apt to give you a slightly better price than he pays the man who dabbles

Leaders.

Nothing more surely marks the adept than the adroit handling of leaders and inserts. Leaders are not merely words printed on a piece of film and inserted into the reel. They either make or mar a story. Given the perfection of action and acting, and a couple of jarring leaders will spoil a portion of the effect, perhaps almost ruin the entire subject for the man of good taste.

Literary value, coupled with brevity, is of course the great requirement. Crude, bald statements may save film, but at an expense of effect. Perhaps nothing is more disagreeable than the constant recurrence of the word "Later" that is used by practically all companies.

"Later" means one three-foot leader instead of an eight or ten-foot leader, and this is, of course, a saving of film, and we are told that the shorter the leader the better. Evidently, then, the one-word leader is the best possible leader, but is it? This does not take into consideration the second function of the leader, which is to act as a drop curtain when it is neccessary to interrupt the action. "Later" suggests a passage of time; a cessation of the action which is taken up at a subsequent period, but "later" is so brief that the interruption is too short and lacks definite quality. It does not bring the action to a full pause, it does not fully establish not only the fact but the suggestion of the passage of time. If the action comes to the full stop suggested by the use of the word, there should be used a leader of eight or ten feet that the interruption of the pictured action may be sufficiently long to mark the fact. You see John leave the house, there is a flash on the screen, we glimpse the one word and John in that very fleeting three feet has acquired a wife and seven small children. It comes very much in the nature of a shock, whereas "Ten years later," would run down five feet and give a longer break or "Ten years later. John and his family," would give ten feet, be an absolute stop and prepare us for the changes.

This is not, of course, a suggestion that all leaders should be long. There are times when the brief leader is better by far than the well-phrased leader. The one word, "Murder!" will better fit a scene of violence than "John witnesses the murder of Banker Pownall." The single word leader here is crude, abrupt and in harmony with the violence of the scene. It helps the effect instead of detracting from it. On the other hand, "Love's young dream" would be a better leader to break to a scene of that description than the more abrupt "In love." One should know when to write the fluent leader, and when to be abrupt.

Equally important is the placement of the leader. Increasing use is made of the cut-in leader because it gives a more direct value to a scene than the leader that precedes an action and possibly deprives the scene of any suspense. "Jack volunteers to save Ethel," run before the scene tells us beforehand just what is to be done and we cannot get excited over a predetermined action, but if the matter is left in doubt as the action commences, it seems that possibly no one will go to her relief and suddenly Jack steps forward and there flashes the cut-in "I'll save her." Unnecessary words have been saved and the moment is made dramatic. There is this added value in the conversational leader, whether it is cut in or run between the scenes, in that there is not needed the fluent expression that is required in the statement leader. The every day speech lacks the literary quality of the printed page and where the above leader might be run in front of the scene without sacrifice of suspense, the simple, "I'll save her!" is better than the more involved statement, not alone because it saves words; where words mean feet, but because it more vividly suggests spirited action that is in harmony with the scene to be played.

Many writers think a leader is merely a leader and can be no more nor less, but the leader should be an intimate part of the story, it should be keyed to the same note as the scene being played, it should not only convey facts but convey them in such a manner that their use helps instead of hurts the story.

Pedigree.

No editor cares who your great-grandmother was. All he is interested in is the sort of story you can write. Don't send in a story with a letter that starts off, "This story is correct, because I am a cousin of Gen. Ferdinand Fedink and he told it to me just before he died." Maybe the editor will be cruel enough to be glad because General Fedink died before he told any more. And, as they say on some of the scripts, "this is a true story."

The editor wants just one thing. He wants a good story Resting.

We told a man we were going on a boat trip. He bromided this: "I suppose you'll think up a lot of stories." Perhaps, but mostly perhaps not. We are going on one of those water palaces not to think, but to rest up the thinker and get it back into thinking shape. Even the steamer itself is laid off now and then to give them a chance to clean the boilers, and we're no steam engine.

A nervous person once asked us how it was we could sleep when he could not and we explained we thought of work every second we were in the office and forgot the work with the same enthusiasm the moment we locked the door. It's one of the secrets of success to rest with the same enthusiasm with which you work, and then you'll work with some enthusiasm.

Learn to rest, if you really work hard. If you don't work hard, learn to need a rest.

Dogs.

If you can write a really good dog story, send us a synopsis of the story and a stamped and self-addressed envelope. If the story looks really good we'll tell you where to send it. Don't ask for the address. We are from Missouri. And do not send the synopsis without something to get it back in. We are not in the market for this stuff. We know where there is a probable market, but they won't advertise it because of their fear of an avalanche. Do you note we said really good. To take the strain off the M. P. W. box, address it Dogs, Box 70, Madison Square Station, New York City. And no answers before October 5th.

College Courses.

The State of Montana is the latest to recognize the new art of photoplay, and has made a liberal appropriation for a course in journalism and photoplay writing at its university at Missoula, the chair being filled by A. L. Stone, formerly editor of the Missoulian and a newspaper man of wide experience. Our own Technique of the Photoplay and Phillips' The Photodrama, are the text books used.

The University of Washington also has a course in photoplay as have numerous other colleges and high schools, and in time these legitimate courses will largely replace the fraudulent schools. Few, even among the photoplay writers themselves, realize the widespread interest taken by the public. In New York, for example, the Public Library lists weekly the five books, other than works of fiction, most in demand during the past week, and Technique of the Photoplay is frequently one of these. The list for the first week in October, for example, ran: Bernhardi's Germany and the Next War, Wile's Men Around the Kaiser, Usher's Pan-Germanism, Kellner, Arnold and De Lisle's Austria of the Austrians and Hungary of the Hungarians, Sargent's Technique of the Photoplay and Sloane's The Balkans.

The Kansas City Inquest.

Walter E. Odell, Coroner of the Kansas City Inquest Circle, writes that the Circle took up work October 5. Evidently the Coroner has been having his troubles. He says:

> As to the Circle, there is nothing better or more refreshing to the mind than meeting a body of writers who are sincere about their work; it is a stimulant to any writer. But, on the other hand, as Coroner of the Kansas City Circle, I have found 90 per cent of the would-be writers not earnest. I have had many people act as if I were being paid a salary by the producers or the government, or from some unknown hand. A few days ago I was requested by a young lady to criticize to the best of my judgment seven of her manuscripts which were written on both sides of ledger pages in very poor long hand in lead pencil. She mentioned the fact that she was too busy to join the Circle and also that she had sent the scripts to every studio she knew of. However, I found her to be one of the promising students of an enterprising concern in Chicago, and so it goes. I am not kicking, but merely relating a little of the experience I have with these boobs that have taken up photoplay writing.

It is not Coroners alone who have their troubles. We just sent home a script written on note paper in long hand and rolled. It was accompanied by a two-cent stamp and the modest request that we read it over and if we thought it might sell, to use the stamp to write for other stamps with which we could send it to the most likely company, supplying the envelopes and time gratis.

Inquest Circles are for the joint study of photoplay writing and the Coroners are not required to act as critics and copyists. Just the other day E. W. Matlack, the Pittsburgh Coroner, replied to a letter asking him to call on a proposition the writer had to make. The proposition was that "Mat" take the bunch of rejections the lady had and revise them for her.

The Inquest Circles are not for the grafters and the Coroners act within their rights in removing from the circle those who want too much for nothing.

The Photodrama.

Henry Albert Phillips announced some time ago that he was writing a book on photoplay that should commence where all others left off. The statement, as he made it, was not as blatant as it sounds in type. He meant that he was about to write a book that should presuppose earlier education in photoplay work. The newness of his idea starts with the cover, for this is the first book on the art that does not embody the word photoplay or scenario in the title, and The Photodrama is the keynote of the argument. Mr. Phillips has not written a book for the beginner. He has written a book that can honestly be commended to those who have already mastered one of the three or four good teaching books.

The volume is uniform in style with Mr. Phillips books on fiction work, and like the others is printed by the Stanhope-Dodge Company, of Larchmont, N. Y. J. Stuart Blackton, of the Vitagraph company, has written an introduction that is a plea for the literature of the film in place of mere mechanical construction. It is one of the sanest discussions of the present situation that has been done and both Mr. Blackton and Mr. Phillips fall in line with this department in declaring the damage done by the directors to whom too great a license is permitted. In his own work Mr. Phillips advances little that is new, but he states clearly and intelligibly the standard facts, presenting them in new aspects that enable the reader to assimilate and retain. He brings to the work his own experience as a writer of photopolays and his riper experience as a teacher of fiction. It is a book worth while.

Better still, it is not a rehash of any other work but original in treatment and thought.

Jones in Town.

Marc Edmund Jones, secretary of the P. A. L., is in town and will remain here over Christmas. There are wild reports of various things he is going to do to further the interests of the league in these parts, but he states that he has merely come on to get a change of location and ideas and that league work is not primarily his idea. Miss Hetty Grey Baker is acting as secretary pro-tem during his absence.

Manufacturers' Notice.

It is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles has been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department, one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 55.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theatre managers looking for high-class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

A 16 c. p. carbon incandescent lamp requires 55 watts. Give the following data: (1) c. p. per watt; (2) watts per c. p.; (3) number of lamps per k. w.; (2) number of lamps per h. p. Suppose you were installing a 66 h. p. motor in your theater, the same to pull a dynamo for lighting. The voltage is 110 and the efficiency of the motor 66 per cent. What size wire is necessary to supply the motor when working at capacity, the circuit being only 10 feet in length? Give the rule by which this is found.

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 49 is as follows: Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; Montreal, Canada; G. D. Bullock, Hobart, Indiana; R. E. Sivley, San Antonio, Texas; A. C. Stewart; Waitsburg, Washington; L. C. LaGrow, Albany, N. Y., and John Solar, Watertown, N. Y.

All the replies in the Roll of Honor are correct, and some of them are excellent, but there was also a surprising number of bad to very bad guessers, while some of the answers showed a lack of knowledge of things of this kind which is deplorable and, in some instances, almost comical. For instance: One operator said that the reason the larger wire was not rated so high was that when you bought copper in large quantities it came cheaper and so the scheme was to make you buy more copper to make up the difference. Now, you may think this man was trying to kid us, but from the rest of the answer I know he was not. This particular answer came from a member of a local in the second largest city in the country, but I will not disgrace the man by naming him, moreover it was commendable that he even tried to answer, for you can bet he will now learn what the real answer is and remember it, too, whereas the unenterprising gink who did not even try to answer, probably won't. He'll read the answer, yes, but it won't be impressed on his mind as it will be on that of the men who tried and failed.

There are several exceptionally good replies, but the one by Brother Sivley, has, I think, somewhat the best of it.

Reply to Question No. 49.

By R. E. Sivley, San Antonio, Texas.

The Question:

A wire having a cross section of 26,244 c. m. has a rated capacity of 46 amperes r. c., and 65 weatherproof, whereas a wire having a cross section of 52,441 c. m. is only rated at 76 amperes r. c., and 100 weatherproof. The area being practically double, why not the rated capacity also? How would you ascertain the diameter of a wire if you had no wire gauge? Has a wire a wattage capacity? How many watts could you convey with a No. 16 wire and keep within its rated capacity?

The Answer:

Any conductor conveying current gives off a certain amount of heat, and this heat must be dissipated through an area which is proportional to the circumference of the wire to its diameter, since the circumference varies directly as the diameter increases or decreases. The cross section of a conductor varies as the square of the diameter, hence it follows as you increase the diameter that the cross section of conductors increases much more rapidly than does its surface, upon which the radiation of heat generated will directly depend, therefore the amperage per c. m. cross section must necessarily be less for large size conductors than for small ones, if the temperature of both is to remain the same under the same operating conditions. This is proven as follows: Suppose we compare a wire 250 mills in diameter with one double that diameter. The circumference of a wire is found by multiplying it diameter by 3.1416, but for convenience let us say that the circumference is three times the diameter. In one case we would have a wire with a circumference equal to 250x3, or, 750, whereas, in the other we would have a circumference equal to 500x3, or, 1500. We therefore see that the larger wire is exactly twice the circumference of the smaller one, therefore for a given length it would have exactly twice the heat radiating surface. On the other hand the area of a wire is found by multiplying its diameter by itself, so that in the smaller wire we would have an area of 250 x 250=62,500 c. m., whereas the larger wire would have an area equal to 500 x 500=250,000 c. m., so that whereas we only doubled the radiating surface we have multiplied the cross section by exactly four, which ought to be sufficient proof that the current capacity cannot be doubled with the doubling of the diameter of the wire and have the heat remain the same. We now get down to the answer, which is that the larger wire has a lower relative rating in order to keep its temperature the same as that of the smaller wire.

From the data given in this question another question naturally arises, viz: Why is the rated capacity of a wire different for rubber covered and other insulations? The answer is that while the actual current carrying capacity of a wire is in no way affected by the character of its insulation, the rated capacity of a rubber covered conductor must be kept low for the reason that rubber deteriorates rapidly when heated continuously.

To find the diameter of a wire without the use of a wire gauge I would cut a narrow strip of paper and wrap it around the bare wire, allowing the ends to lap over each other, and then draw a pen knife through the paper where the two ends lap so as to cut it just so the two ends meet snugly. I would then measure the length of the paper precisely in hundredths of an inch, and multiply this measurement by 10, which will give its length in thousandths of an inch, or mills. I would then divide the result thus obtained by 3.1416, and the answer would be the diameter of the wire in mills, which multiplied by itself would give the c. m. area of the wire, and by consulting tables in text books the size of the wire could then readily be found.

Properly speaking, a wire has no wattage capacity unless the voltage (E) be specified. Where the voltage is specified then the capacity is E. I. watts, where I is its rated current capacity in amperes. You could convey 6 E watts on a No. 16 R. C. wire ("6 E" means 6 multiplied by E. Ed.) where E is the voltage at which the current is to be transmitted.

Friend Bullock in his reply to Question 49 suggests the following methods of ascertaining the size of a wire without a gauge:

There are several methods of finding wire sizes without a gauge. If you have instruments for measuring resistance, and know the length of your wire, you can find its resistance, and in this manner determine the size of your wire. Example: Supposing you find that 200 feet of wire has the resistance of 4/10 ohm. The resistance of 1,000 feet will be 2 ohms. In your wire tables you will find that No. 14 wire has an approximate resistance of 2 ohms per 1,000 feet. Another, and probably more convenient method will be to find the weight of a convenient length of bare wire, and in this manner compute the wire size. Example: You find that 10 feet of wire weighs approximately 2 ounces; 1,000 would weigh 200 ounces or 12.43 pounds. Referring to your tables you find that No. 14 wire has an approximate weight of 12.43 pounds per 100 feet. You can find these tables in any good electrical handbook or catalog.

Wattage capacity depends, not on size, but upon insulation. No. 16 wire has an allowable capacity of 6 amperes. At 110 volts the watt allowable will be 660 with rubber covered insulation. With a properly installed high tension line No. 16 would easily carry its amperage capacity at 1,000,000 volts, or 5,000,000 watts. In house wiring, however, not more than 600 watts is allowable on circuits of No. 14 wire or smaller. No. 16 in this case would only be allowed in fixtures.

Brother Bullock's method of determining the size of wire is all right as far as it goes, also it is ingenious, but he has overlooked the simple, practical method which is partly given by Friend Sivley. For myself I would have said take the wire to a machine shop, if one was handy, and have it measured in thousandths of an inch with a micrometer calliper; multiply the measurement by itself and look in the wire tables for corresponding area. Sivley's way of doing it amounts to pretty near the same thing, provided one has a scale reading in hundredths of an inch. If one has such an animal then Sivley's method is better than the machine shop proposition.

Condenser Sizes.

J. F. Heise, Fort Totten, New York, orders a question booklet and inquires:

> What size condensers would you advise me to use on a throw of 85 feet the objective being 6½e. f.? Am now using a 6½ and 9½ combination, with the 6½ at the rear. I have used several combinations, but cannot get a clear field.

Well, Brother Heise, I am going to "try it on the dog," you representing the canine in this particular case, for which I trust you will grant your forgiveness and not bite me. I have an article by an optician which will soon be published. This optican compiled a table giving the condenser sizes to be used with various lenses. His instruction is to use a 5½ rear and a 9-inch front condenser with a 6½ objective, and locate the condenser 16½ inches from the film, but, while I have not the time to go through the entire article to look up this particular matter, I think the "16½ inches" is from a central point between the two condensing lenses, and not from face of the front one, but you can try it both ways. I would like to ask you, Brother Heise, to try this out and report results. Also on Page 430, July 18th issue Brother Griffiths, of Ansonia, Conn., gives a table in which he advises that a 6½ lens be used next to the light, with a 9½ in front, and one-eighth of an inch between the two lenses; that the condenser be located 13¾ inches from the center of the combination to the film, and that the arc be located 4 5-10 inches from the condenser. Now, I wonder if I could get you also to also try this out. It would, of course, involve a little expense and some trouble, since it would call for the purchase of some extra lenses, but, nevertheless I trust your manager will be willing to do this for the good of the business, and that you will report exactly what you find in the way of results, being careful that the condensers in both cases set parallel with each other, and that the optical system is properly lined. (See page 228 of the Handbook).

Seattle Local is Progressive.

From a member of Seattle Local 154 comes the following:

> The progressives of our local got some legislation past the reactionaries at the last meeting which deserves attention, and ought to be noted in the projection department. As a preliminary I might say that our city is one of the worst I know of for brown shadows at the bottom of the picture. It is not a pleasant thing to have to admit this, but, nevertheless, facts are facts, and perhaps it might help wake up some of the sleepy ones to have this little piece of truth come from New York City, and hit them between the eyes. The boys, or more correctly speaking, some of them, have large, comfortable rooms, motors, work benches, easy chairs and two machines, but they have been abusing these conditions. The local, however, has decided to assess a fine on every operator who is caught by one of the officers of the local with a brown shadow on the screen. Now, if this is carried through to its ultimate conclusion it is going to mean wonderfully improved projection in Seattle; also it will mean full coffers for the local, and a mighty slim pocketbook for some of the boys for awhile.

I most decidedly feel like saying "Hurray" for 154, or, in the language of the brown man, "Banzai," or, as the cow-puncher would say, "Whoopee," all down, set' em up in 'tother alley! I have no sympathy whatever with the pocketbooks or their owners, but I have a lot of respect for the local that will pass that kind of legislation and make it stick. Having visited Seattle operating rooms I can certify to the fact that they are comfortable, well ventilated, roomy, and that the operators have no excuse for shadows on the screen, since the managers are progressive, and allow the use of sufficient current to prevent it; therefore, if I were assessing those fines I would make it one dollar for the first offence, two for the second, five for the third, and expulsion from the union for the fourth. Local 154 has done herself proud, and there are a lot of other locals scattered over this glorious land of the free that might well emulate her example.

Fire Proofing.

Minneapolis, Minnesota, writes as follows:

> Can you give some method of fire proofing a cloth curtain?

I can, Minneapolis, although the fire proofing of a curtain, or projection, is, in my humble opinion, the rankest kind of rank nonsense. Any fabric may be fire proofed by thoroughly saturating it with phosphate ammonia mixed in the proportion of one pound to one gallon of water. In the case of the screen, I would stretch it on a frame, dissolve the phosphate in water and saturate the fabric thoroughly by using a new, cheap paint brush. Let it dry and, while it will char, it will not and cannot be made to blaze. A lighted match would char the fabric where a blaze came into actual contact with it, but that would be all there would be to it—just a hole in the cloth. Phosphate of ammonia may be had of retail druggists at about 75 cents a pound. What the wholesale price is I don't know, but a gallon ought to, I should suppose, do an ordinary size screen. There is nothing in phosphate of ammonia which will injure the fabric. Whether soaking wood in this solution would fireproof it or not I cannot say. I presume it would. I intend to experiment and find out. Later: Fireproofs it fine.

A Fine Room.

From S. A. Arnold, manager of the Palace theater, Little Rock, Arkansas, comes a picture of his operating room, but I am sorry to say there is no data accompanying the photograph. Apparently the room is a beauty. The ventilation certainly is ample; the ceiling is high, and the floor, we presume, is of cement. The machine circuit wires are in conduits under the floor, as they should be, and apparently the shutter master cord comes down near the aperture of the machine, which also is as it should be. The only possible criticism I could offer is the setting of the machines right up against the wall. There is plenty of room, so why not set them back a couple of feet, so that the operator can walk clear around his machines and can look through the lenses to thread a frame. True, the observation ports are not the kind I like, and they are located at a height which would compel the operator to stand up all the time, which is unnecessary. However, they are of ample dimensions and their width is especially to be commended. Taken altogether, I compliment friend Arnold on having a real operating room and not a "coop."

Seventy Volt Generator.

E. G. Mayer, Waterbury, Connecticut, writes as follows:

> I note in your valuable department constant reference being made to 70-volt generators; also same is mentioned in question 40, August 22d issue. What is the advantage of a 70-volt generator? Why should it be used rather than a 55 or 110-volt one? Where can such a generator be purchased? If a plant is installed consisting of a direct connected gas engine and a 110-volt generator, do you consider it advisable to belt a separate 55-volt generator to the fly wheel for the purpose of supplying projection current without the use of rheostat?

A portion of your question is replied to on page 183 of the Handbook, of which, I presume, you have a copy. If you have not, I would suggest that you remit $2.50 to the Moving Picture World and get one at once. It is a book of 425 pages of text matter and illustrations dealing almost entirely with matters pertaining to projection. Briefly, the d. c. arc voltage averages about 48, and if you use 110-volt current you have got to break the voltage down to 48, which means an absolute waste equaling the amperes used times the difference between 48 and 110, or, more than half the power taken from the line.

The 55-volt generator is not desirable because, in order to get the best results, there must be a resistance cushion for the arc, and while 60 volts does fairly well, and one can handle an arc supplied by a 60-volt generator so as to get very good results, still, to my way of thinking, it is not quite enough cushion, and a 70-volt generator is, I think, worth the extra waste involved in its use. The objections to the 70 as against the 110 is that it is somewhat more difficult to secure motors, and incandescent lights of that voltage, but this would be obviated by installing a 110-volt generator for the incandescents, motors, etc., and a 60 or 70-volt generator for projection current in case you put in your own plant.

Be Careful in Ordering Lenses.

About four out of five exhibitors and operators who order lenses commit the error of not giving sufficient data. It is absolutely necessary and essential that full and complete information be sent if your lens orders are to be properly filled. Exhibitors and operators should not only measure the exact distance from the lens flange on the mechanism to the center of the screen (not the top or the bottom, but the center, mind you), but should also give the exact height that the lenses are located above the center of the screen. This specific information is particularly essential when the operator or exhibitor gives the height of his desired picture, instead of the width. Every particle of information that is possible for the operator or exhibitor to give is always desirable when orders are to be filled for projection outfits or lenses.

Let me again emphasize that it is never advisable to give the height of the picture alone when ordering lenses, but the width also, this, by reason of the fact that the height of the picture is a variable quantity which will become greater, in proportion to its width, as the height of the lens above the screen is increased, until in very steep projection sometimes the picture is practically square, or, in extreme cases, even higher than it is wide. But the width never varies appreciably where the machine is located central, sidewise, with the screen. There is, of course, a slight variation where two machines are used, since neither one can be central with the screen, but it is not enough to be considered. It is far better to give too much information than too little; don't forget that important fact when you are ordering lenses.

Galveston Operators Get a Raise.

The Galveston, Texas, union demanded $25.00 per week for chief operators, and $15.00 for assistants. Five of the theaters, the Crystal, Tabloid, Majestic, Leader, Star and Cozy, signed the agreement, and five managers declined, they being the Queen, Crystal, Beach Crystal, Dixie and the Princess. There was a strike on in these houses, but, as yet, we have not been informed as to the outcome. It seems as though the managers of the first-named five houses showed superior judgment. It also seems that fifteen dollars is not enough for the assistant, provided he is supposed to be an operator. We trust the boys have won out, and that all is again lovely in the city of the Great Sea Wall. Surely when the dissenting managers came to think the matter over they must have concluded it would not be wise to fight against so reasonable a demand.

Foolish Talk.

R. C. Byers, Erie, Pennsylvania, sends in a clipping from the "Cleveland Leader," September 8th, in which one Sam Bullock, after charging that the Cleveland Operators' Local had made a demand for $2.50 a week increase, and had sent out notification of same to Cleveland managers by a "bulldozing flying squadron" of operators, consumes considerable more language to no purpose, and then says:

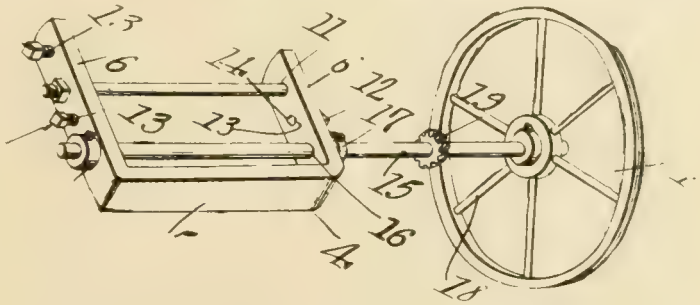
> It is a hold-up proposition in more ways than one. Every manager has pulled through the dullest summer ever known without laying them (the operators) off for a day. Their rate of pay is higher than any known line of work, and any bright boy of sixteen can become expert in a week; in fact, I can name a dozen of them off-hand who learned in half that time; if not, I will donate fifty dollars to their treasury. Their job is neither unhealthful or dangerous under present modern code regulations, and they have not the slightest excuse or warrant for the making of such an exorbitant demand.

Well, I think I will just call Brother Bullock's little bluff, and my call won't be any "bluff" either. I won't undertake to donate any fifties, but if you, Samuel Bullock, will show the "bright sixteen-year-old boy" in Cleveland, or elsewhere, who can "become an expert operator in a week, or half that time," I will pay you five hundred dollars in perfectly good, United States money, but—if you cannot do it, you pay me the five hundred, and this proposal, mind you, is no bluff either. The test of it shall be that this "expert sixteen-year-older" shall be selected by a committee, in Cleveland, composed of two union operators and two managers, plus your Humble Servant, who will come there for the purpose (after both you and I have each deposited the five hundred bucks in the bank), and after three and a half, or even seven days of instruction he is to go to Massachusetts to take the examination, his expenses to be paid by the loser, and if he passes he is then to be placed in sole charge of the operating room of the best theater in Cleveland with guards stationed so that no one but himself can go near the operating room, and if he remains there and projects the show in your highest class theater all by his lonesome for a period of one week, the matter will be completed, and the five hundred is yours. Now, Mr. Bullock, come across, or cease from wasting good printer's ink in making an empty noise. But, bear in mind, that the committee, plus the editor, will see to it that this sixteen-year-old B. M. Y. does not know anything about projection when he starts in, and is not an electrician, but just a "bright young man." So far as the "bull-dozing flying squadron" be concerned, I don't know anything about it, but on the face of it I do not believe it, and on top of that it does not seem to me that a two-fifty a week increase is anything to do very much fighting over. Would Bullock raise a strenuous protest on that much increase in the price of film service? The statement that the operators' salaries are higher than any other line of work is really too puerile to receive serious consideration. I wonder what Friend Bullock would say if he were managing a theater in San Francisco where the scale is from thirty to forty dollars a week, and managers pay the scale too; also they told me personally that it was better value than they received when operators were cheap.

A Motor Drive.

F. C. McClinton, Cedar Falls, Iowa, is the patentee of a motor drive for the Powers Six machine. He describes the device as follows:

> I claim this drive to be the most simple thing on the market. I have one in all the large theaters in Minneapolis, and quite a number scattered over the country. The boys all seem to be well pleased, and say it is not only the best they have ever used, but also very easy to install. Quite a few use this device and drive their machine with a fan motor. Have one on our machine here and a variable speed one-eighth h. p. motor supplies the power. The thing has the further recommendation of cheapness. The patent is for sale, as I have not sufficient time to spare to push the matter. I would like to hear from you with regard to it.



The drive, Brother McClinton, certainly is simple, and ought to be correspondingly cheap. However, aside from the possible difference in price, I really am unable to see where it has any particular advantage over the regular Powers Six drive, in effect it amounts to the same thing, except that you use a large drive pulley instead of gears for reducing. Now this might or might not be considered an advantage, according to individual ideas. I would rather pass that matter up to the department, let him look at it, and decide for themselves whether it is an improvement over the regular Powers drive. So far as the necessary power be concerned I do not see that there would be any practical difference, since, regardles of the form of speed reduction employed, there is a certain given amount of work to do, and it would take a certain amount of power to do it, though there is possibly a little extra loss in the gearing of the Powers drive, but certainly not enough to amount to anything. I cannot undertake to return drawings sent for publication, unless they are of considerable value. In this case it was necessary to cut the drawing up. You can get another from the patent office for 10 cents.

Joke Is on Smith.

T. H. Williams, Buxton, Iowa, comments on Brother Smith's answer to Question 41 as follows:

> Smith's answer to Question 41 reminds me of a little story which runs thusly: Two Englishmen were sailing up the Father of Waters in an old "side-wheeler," the same being propelled by a walking-beam engine. First Englishman after giving the engine the once over: "Bally complicated contraption, that, old chap." Second Englishman: Not when you understand it, old top. You see it's this way: One thing goes up and another comes down, then they turn on the blasted smoke and that makes the wheels go round." First Englishman: "Bah Jove! That's bloomin' simple, don't you know."

I think the joke is on Brother Smith. In my comment on his answer I said that some of the dope set forth was too much for the editor. However, probably if I had a perfectly simple explanation like the Englishman's it would have been all right, but, nevertheless, as I before stated, Smith's answer contained, I think, data having real merit for those who can understand it.

A Warning: Carbon Economizer Patent.

W. C. Cox, New Orleans, Louisiana, writes the department as follows:

> On page 1773, September 19th issue, I notice a comment on a note of inquiry received by you from Willard Fait Jr., of the Dixie theater, Baltimore, Md., relative to a carbon economizer on exhibition at the convention at Dayton, Ohio. I believe myself to be the original inventor of this device, and that some person has imitated my invention and placed same on exhibition at Dayton. My application for patent now pending was made November 23rd, 1913, the patent number being 818171, dated February 11th, 1914. I believe all other persons offering a similar device for sale to be infringers, and they should be warned to withdraw the device they are offering for sale, since they are infringing on my rights. I trust you will take note of this and make such comment as you think right.

Well, Brother Cox, I don't know just what to say, because I do not know the status of your patent. It is quite possible that these other gentlemen made application before you did. Now suppose I took sides with you and this fact developed later. Don't you see I would be making a monkey of myself. It would not be right for me to mix in this matter at this time, nor do I think it would be right for me to say much at any time, it being purely, wholly and entirely a matter for the courts. However, Friend Cox, after your patent is allowed I shall be glad to give your economizer an illustrated description in the department, together with the statement that it is protected with a patent.

New York Operators' Ball.

On Saturday evening, November 7th, Moving Picture Machine Operators' Protective Union, Local 306, I. A. T. S. E., will give their annual ball at Palm Garden, 58th street, New York City, and to this affair, which will be one of the first and finest of the season, Local Union 306 invites not only its friends and acquaintances but its enemies, if any it has, as well.

The operators' ball of last year was a most thoroughly enjoyable affair. The coming affair, however, is expected to eclipse the last effort in every way. Palm Garden accommodates a huge crowd, but it is believed that, large as it is, its capacity will be taxed to the limit. The local itself has almost six hundred members, while its friends would probably number six hundred thousand, therefore it is a case of come early and avoid the rush.

Already a number of film celebrities have announced their intention of gracing the occasion by their presence. The various machine manufacturers and film producers have had boxes reserved, and the indication is that those boxes will be filled to overflowing.

As time passes the importance of the work of the operator receives constantly increasing recognition, and also, as time passes the men themselves acquire an increased respect for their calling. All this operates to place the operator upon a higher plane, and secure for him an increasing friendship among men of affairs. It therefore follows that affairs pulled off by the operators receive recognition not accorded them a few years ago.

Local 306 cordially invites the members of surrounding locals to attend its ball, and the editor would suggest that it would not be at all a bad scheme if, in addition to the surrounding small town locals, Boston, Springfield, New Haven, Philadelphia and Baltimore, arrange to have representatives present. I am sure the exchange of courtesies of this kind would create a feeling of friendliness which would be well worth its cost, and I am also sure that Local 306 would feel not only honored, but proud to entertain representatives from other locals upon this occasion.

Joliet, Illinois, Operators.

William Reeder, of Local 545, Joliet, Ill., forwards the accompanying photograph which was taken Labor Day, September 7th.

Top row from left to right: T. Ryan, William Reeder, O. Gardner, C. Schroderbeck, H. Reeves, H. Green. Front row: G. Green, A. Keller, J. Kraft, F. Wimmert, H. Brown. Bottom: A. Brewer, H. Webster.

Quite a classy-looking bunch all right, all right. Quite a classy-looking bunch.

Some Clever Work.

David C. Adams, a member of the M. P. M. U. local in Peoria, Illinois, forwards some very clever drawings, not suitable, however, for publication in this department, and the following verses which, I think, proves Friend Adams to be possessed of talent. Of course, I suppose when the Nicholas Power Company sees this in print they will get real angry—not.

THE POWER BEHIND THE THROW.

The olden days of mystery when movies were unknown,
Produced the kings in history whose law was all their own;
They get the blame or glory for Dame Fortune's smile or frown—
Just like a fairy story for the guy who wore the crown;
But there ever was a factor to direct the hand, that's shown,
And the king was but an actor for the power behind the throne.

In the zenith of attainment is the motion picture show,
It's an ideal entertainment; highest art at prices low.
Some praise men who get together reels of princely pantomime,
Some praise managers—they'd rather have your nickel or your dime.
Few find praise for operators, but they care not if you'd know
Praise is due to the creators of the Power behind the throw.

If the picture's clear and steady, and it's not too fast or slow—
Get some praise, just have it ready—we all need some here below.
When you pass the ticket-taker, speak your praise, then tell the youth
That you'd have him name the maker of the outfit in the booth;
And he'll not say, "Ask his nibs," or put you off with "I don't know" -
Why such diplomatic fibs when there's a Power behind the throw?

The future day of photoplay from seeds of praise now sown
Will yield machines for film display in universal tone.
One word of praise will do more good than words of fault galore;
Then soon the general average would produce a perfect score.
For mutual welfare all should know this phrase from zone to zone:
"N. Power's the power behind the throw and king upon the throne."

St. Paul Examinations.

A St. Paul, Minnesota, operator has written, saying that city is figuring on having an examination for operators in the near future, and that the officials have written to Chicago and other cities to find out what constitutes a fair examination, but did not get the information desired, and they are therefore still at sea. St. Paul then continues:

> I told them that the editor of the projection department of the Moving Picture World, New York City, was the man who could tell them what constitutes a fair examination, and after I showed them the new Handbook they concluded I was correct and asked me to write you requesting you to communicate with them. For myself I hope you will, for I would like to see them put on either a fair examination, or none at all.

In response to this I have written the St. Paul officials and have suggested certain questions, and pointed out the fact that the thing, and the only thing for the examiner to do is to use common sense, and ask questions tending to determine the actual knowledge of the applicant. I have suggested certain questions, not with intention that these particular ones be used, but merely pointing out the line along which an examination should be conducted. I trust St. Paul operators will be not found wanting, but I would suggest that they buckle down, and do a little, good, hard studying, particularly on the electrical action of the three-wire system, of transformers, of grounds, etc., etc. It won't do any good to "cram" a lot of stuff. You must study and learn. If you simply cram a lot of stuff so you can repeat it by heart the examiner can detect that proposition in two minutes. For instance: If I asked you to explain to me the electrical action of a transformer, or economizer, I would undertake the contract of telling, before you had said twenty-five words whether you understood the subject or not. It is as much the way an applicant goes about it, as what he actually says, when answering questions, that indicates the amount of knowledge possessed. To the operator, I would say: When you are being examined don't get excited, but just keep cool and use your brains. The The applicant who has real knowledge has nothing to fear, but the applicant who has not real knowledge—well he's the one who ought to get excited, and probably will.

GREATER LOVE HATH NO MAN (Edison), October 6.—A story of the far East, by Mary Imlay Taylor, featuring Mabel Trunnelle, as Foomi San, a Japanese maiden, and she makes a great success of the part. It contains a strong love theme and there are many tragic moments, which holds the spectators closely. The English element is made up of army officers. The acting on the part of the members of the cast deserves the highest mention, and the photography is exceptional. This is a release worth seeing.

THE VERDICT (Essanay), October 6.—Adapted from a Munsey Magazine story by Edward T. Lowe, Jr., and produced by Hal Davis. In this picture there is displayed remarkable modern photography and the settings tend to make it a most extraordinary production, it might be termed a picture of flowers. The love story involves two girls, close friends, both of whom are innocent and trusting, and a man whose duplicity is despicable. Beverly Bayne, Gerda Holmes and Bryant Washburn do some excellent work. This is a pleasing number.

WHAT WOULD YOU DO? (Columbus), October 6.—This is a baby story, which starts off with one baby and ends up with baskets full of babies of all shades and sizes. A mother is driven almost insane by two practical jokers, in whose care she has left her baby while she attends a mother's meeting. There are all sorts of amusing complications occur and the father comes in for his share of suspense. It is an interesting and amusing comedy.

THE WAY OF THE REDMAN (Selig), October 6.—This story is well named, and though a civilized Indian, he demonstrates in the final gruesome scene that the primitiveness of his forefathers dominates his nature. Through the treachery of the white man he has befriended he seems justified in his vengeance. This is not a very pleasant picture to view, however it has been well done and contains many beautiful scenes.

FOR THE LOVE OF MIKE (Kalem), October 6.—This is the first of the new Tuesday comedies inaugurated by the Kalem company. It is quite funny along boisterous lines and introduces a police force. The development at the finish is the most laughable part of it. On the same reel with "Hesanut Hunts Wild Game."

HESANUT HUNTS WILD GAME (Kalem), October 6.—On the same reel with "For the Love of Mike." This is an animated comedy cartoon which has been only fairly photographed, otherwise it is passable.

WIFIE'S ATHLETIC MAMMA (Lubin), October 6.—A mother-in-law story with quite a punch (the mother-in-law, not the story). She opens a physical culture school. This is a sort of give-and-take farce, very strenuous, and funny only in spots. The son-in-law ends his career on a stretcher. On the same reel with "A Hunting Absurdity." It earns laughs.

A HUNTING ABSURDITY (Lubin), October 6.—On the same reel with "Wifie's Athletic Mamma." A cartoon picture by Vincent Whitman, rather comical and mystifying, but the photography is not adequate in places.

SETH'S SWEETHEART (Edison), October 7.—A comedy picture play in which Viola Dana and William Wadsworth have the leading parts. Two city chaps interfere with Seth's love affair with Sally and he becomes desperate. He decides to commit suicide to relieve his lacerated feelings, but has an awful time determining on the method he will adopt. The comedy situations are very well worked out and the acting is adequate. An average comedy release.

THE FABLE OF THE FAMILY THAT DID TOO MUCH FOR NELLIE (Essanay), October 7.—George Ade demonstrates in this offering that it does not pay to make too much over a servant, especially the cook, but then they had had thirteen different ones in thirty days. She happens to be a good one and they doll her up and kid her along until she imagines she is the whole thing; she repays them by marrying the butcher. Moral: Give Them Books to Read. Gerda Holmes, Thos. Commerford and Adele McLellan are the able principals. Good for laughs anywhere.

REPARATION (Selig), October 7.—While this is not a very pleasant picture to view, there is much in the development of the plot that holds the interest of the spectator. The scenes are laid in the South during the Civil war and concerns two sisters, surviving members of an old Southern family. The younger falls into the hands of a weak and unreliable man, who after their marriages abuses her. Later he receives his just deserts in the final strong closing scene. It is well produced and acted and will please the average spectator.

KILL OR CURE (Vitagraph), October 7.—This comedy picture play is considerably more of a boisterous order than the usual Vitagraph comedy and the departure is not a happy one. It is made up of the escapades of a mischievous kid, which are more absurd than amusing; the laughs in it are not over-abundant. The cast is made up of some of their best stock people, who work hard to make it go. Children will be pleased no doubt.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 64 (Selig), October 8.—Principal among the many typical views shown are the fans watching the last games of the two leadinp baseball clubs, in anticipation of viewing the champion series; students from English schools and colleges enlisting in the army; stragglers cut off by foes join Belgian army; Hwang Hsing, Chinese General, visits United States, and many other late happenings are embraced, which makes it pleasing.

WHEN SLIPPERY SLIM MET THE CHAMPION (Essanay), October 8.—This is one of the best comedies of the Slippery Slim series so far, in which Victor Potel is featured; it gains continuous laughter from the start to finish, and Slim certainly is finished in the end. One of the funniest comedy ring scenes imaginable is contained in this picture, and if exhibitors wish to give their audiences good hearty laughs they will find this offering will qualify in this respect.

THEIR LITTLE DRUDGE (Biograph), October 8.—A domestic picture play that qualifies in a pleasing manner, and it is well acted and produced. Much that is of heart interest is embraced in a plain story of every day life. The ending scenes are somewhat mild, but nevertheless charmingly convincing in the tag. Can recommend this release as a good one in all respects.

THE LOAN SHARK KING (Vitagraph), October 8.—The author of this picture play, Laura Colfax has written a very convincing story, the scenes of which call heavily upon the sympathy of the audience. A father through his avarice brings suffering and death to his own child. There is a fine illustration of a young husband being forced to obtain a loan from the "loan shark" to provide necessities for his sick wife for the payments of which he is hounded to desperation. Van Dyke Brooke, Norma Talmadge and Antonio Moreno most ably portray the leading characters. There is a surprising denouement which makes of this a most pleasing offering.

THEY WERE COLLEGE BOYS (Biograph), October 9.—A comedy picture that contains considerable merit through its complications. A father offers his son a sum of money to get married and settle down. The son and his college chum perceive a plan to "get the money." The scheme involves the whole family in funny situations. The father to save himself from a compromising situation is forced to "fork over." A laughing release.

THE MAN HUNTERS (Biograph), October 9.—On the same reel with "They Were College Boys." A comedy picture concerning an escaped convict, for whom a reward is offered. A spinster captures the culprit after the entire police force has failed. She also captures the chief of police for a husband. A boisterous comedy.

THE TATTERED DUKE (Kalem), October 9.—A Ruth Roland-Marshal Neilan comedy in which the two play the leading parts. The scenes of the play are located in the west. The plot develops that Greasy Bill, waiter at the Golden Gulch hash emporium, finds the wallet of the Duke of Tattenham Corners and proceeds to impersonate him at a summer resort. All goes well until the real duke turns up, but incog. He allows Bill to "splurge a few," then discloses his identity, to Bill's chagrin; then back to the hash-house for Bill. A more than average comedy.

THE GREEN-EYED MONSTER (Lubin), October 9.—A picture play which contains a good temperance lesson, written by Wilbert Melville and directed by Paul Powell. There are many fetching water scenes, alone the coast and about the lighthouse, kept by the father of Velma, who is the sweetheart of a boatman who is addicted to drink. Jealousy is the main theme of the plot and almost causes a murder, the realization of which attempted crime brings redemption to the man who attempted it. Velma Whitman is convincing as the lighthouse keeper's daughter. An average release.

JIMMIE THE PORTER (Selig), October 9.—This is a comedy that is greeted with much appreciation and hilarity, which it deserves. To be with his sweetheart, fearing a rival, Jimmie bribes the colored porter of a private car to allow him to take his place on a trip west. The girl's father has his rival as a guest and the trouble that Jimmie gets into, being subjected to all sorts of humiliation by his rival, is productive of much amusement. Finally he is exposed by being discovered kissing the daughter, on whose chin is deposited a quantity of cork from his blackened face. Jimmie wins out. A clever release.

DOC YAK'S BOTTLE (Selig), October 9.—On the same reel with "Jimmie the Porter." This comic comes very near being the best of this series of animated cartoons, and is greeted with great appreciation.

JOSIE'S LEGACY (Vitagraph), October 9.—This comedy features Josie Sadler, maid of all work at the Pleasant Valley Hotel. Everybody has a beau but Josie. She has Hank, the grocer's boy (Billy Quirk), but he is too busy to do much courting. Josie is not very popular at the hotel until she falls heir to a legacy left her by an aunt in Germany; then she has suitors galore, but Hank is the favored one. He is sorry when he discovers of what the legacy consists. One of the best comedies the Vitagraph has released recently.

HIS MOTHER'S HOME (Biograph), October 10.—A picture play that contains a great deal of anguish and it has evidently been written for the purpose of conveying a lesson. It contains elements, which while they are occurring every minute throughout the universe, it would be better to leave such off the screen. The picture has been well produced photographically and is ably and artistically acted. The theme is the only fault to be found with it.

A FRAGMENT OF ASH (Edison), October 1[illegible] A very entertaining story, written by R. M. Freeman, is developed in this picture regarding the loss of a valuable necklace, which is recovered by a young barrister who plays amateur detective. The point of interest which he evinces in the affair is to make good with Lady Cranforth, as he is in love with her daughter. A fragment of ash from a private brand cigarette gives him a clue to the perpetrator. There is considerable suspense during his deductions, but with the skill of a professional he recovers the necklace, and gains the consent of her ladyship to the hand of her daughter. This picture contains merit.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE GREASER (Essanay), October 10.—Another western drama in which Mr. Anderson features himself; he has also written and directed the picture and is supported by Lee Willard, Marguerite Clayton and others. In this offering Broncho Billy is a postmaster and loses a mail sack. However, the loss and the fact that it is about to be restored by a girl whom he has befriended is instrumental in saving his life from a Greaser with whom he has had trouble. This release is on a par with the others of this series.

WHEN THE HAM TURNED (Lubin), October 10.—Any one that is fond of seeing boisterous, rough-and-tumble comedies can certainly have their appetites satiated, as this is one of the old fashioned acrobatic pictures. There are some of the ridiculous scenes that gain laughter. The caricature make-ups and the repetition of scenes disgust rather than amuse. A. D. Hotling as the author and Frank C. Griffin, director, are responsible for this production.

HER VICTORY ETERNAL (Selig), October 10.—There is used in this picture story a theme which, if ever, has been seldom used. It hinges on the intense love of a wife and mother for her husband and only son. These two vie with each other to please her and the family's happiness is complete, until the husband is killed by accident and the love for the son saves the mother from insanity. Later the mother is frantically jealous of her son's fiancee. She attempts to dissemble for their sake; however, the son is drowned before the wedding and the mother is almost happy in "her victory eternal." It will please the sentimental.

FATE'S MIDNIGHT HOUR (Kalem), October 10.—A tragic picture play written by Frederick E. Lindsey, and directed by Kenean Buel, featuring Alice Joyce, supported by what is claimed to be an all-star cast. The picture is rather an extraordinary one, with an original plot, containing some very thrilling and intense moments. A girl is saved from committing murder, just at the critical second, by nature's weapon —lightning. Some exceptional scenes are beautifully photographed. Miss Joyce does some intense and excellent acting. Worthy of viewing.

THE GUIDING FATE (Biograph), Oct. 12.—There is impressive action in this picture play and scenes that are appealing to the spectator. Jealousy on the part of a husband, who misunderstands the sympathy shown by a neighbor for his young wife, causes all the trouble. Claire McDowell, H. A. Barrows and Charles H. West play the principal parts artistically. Several scenes occur which are filled with moments of suspense, and while free of melodramatic action, there are thrilling moments. An offering of interest.

BUSTER BROWN'S EDUCATION (Edison), Oct. 12.—In this release the usual characters appear, Buster, Mary Jane, Tige and the goat. To keep Buster out of mischief his mother advertises for a tutor in a newspaper. Buster installs a sign in front of the lawn on which he inscribes, "Wanted, a Tutor to Tute Two Tots, etc.," and then they await the result. The first applicant "receives his" in large doses; the second, a little German professor, reverses things and Buster, Mary Jane, Tige and the goat "get theirs." This is very laughable.

GEORGE WASHINGTON JONES (Edison), Oct. 12.—On the same reel with "Buster Brown's Education." This picture was written and directed by Charles H. France and is a burlesque on spiritualism. It is full of rapid action, but contains little that is deserving of comment. Hodgepodge is the predominating feature.

SWEEDIE LEARNS TO SWIM (Essanay), Oct. 12.—Written for laughing purposes, its scenes are filled with impossibilties; nevertheless, it is greeted with uproarious laughter. Sweedie is determined to learn to swim and makes her first attempt in the bath tub, which is not much of a success. Then she fills the bathroom half full of water and practices fancy diving. The people of the flat below object to shower baths and Sweedie gets into all sorts of trouble. It is full of laughs.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 63 (Selig), Oct. 12.—Many interesting and topical happenings are visualized, principal among which are: Selection of horses for the New York Mounted Police; scenes during the Newark, N. J., Police Carnival; $50,000,000 being hauled through the streets of New York under police protection and private guards; Canadian volunteers receiving instruction in camp in marksmanship, in trenches, etc.; Royal Canadian Dragoons in manoeuvres; indoor yachtsmen at San Francisco, entertain and feast a horde of poor children. It is all very pleasing.

'MIDST WOODLAND SHADOWS (Vitagraph), Oct. 12.—A summer idyl written and produced by Ralph Ince. This is an exceptional story, and the well-selected forest scenes are beautifully photographed. There are some little inconsistencies exist, perhaps, in the mind of the reviewer in the first scenes, that are happily clarified later, and a charming wedding ceremony is performed by a lovable old minister, under the forest trees. Anita Stewart, Earle Williams, Herbert Frank and Frank Currier are excellent in their various characters. This is a most pleasing production.

GWENDOLIN (Biograph), October 6.—This two-part drama was suggested by George Eliot's powerful novel of social alliances, "Daniel Deronda." The plot of the story has been closely adhered to. There has been great care shown in the selection of the backgrounds and exceptional photography pertains. Those that are familiar with the story, and it has been universally read, will enjoy it. Every detail has been carefully taken care of. The acting of all in the cast is commendable.

HIS UNKNOWN GIRL (Vitagraph), October 6.—A special feature in two parts, written and produced by Captain Harry Lambart. This is a military play and is produced by a strong cast. Two comrades are in love with the same girl, but unknown to each other. One is killed in battle and before his death he gives his friend a photograph, which reveals to him the peculiar circumstances, and later the survivor marries the girl. There are very interesting complications in the plot. The picture is full of thrilling scenes.

THE LOST MAIL SACK (Kalem), October 7.—A two-act railroad drama featuring Helen Holmes. A novel expedient is used in this picture play by which two hoboes accidentally secure a mail sack and rifle it of its contents. An innocent person receives the blame for the loss of the sack. There is much intensity in the scenes, especially where Mary (Miss Holmes), by clever work straightens out the complicated affair and saves her sweetheart. The acting is excellent. An interesting picture.

THE GIRL AT THE LOCK (Lubin), October 7.—A two-part picture play written by Clay M. Greene and produced by Edgar Jones in a most creditable manner. While this picture is of melodramatic flavor it holds close attention and interest throughout its many scenes. Louise Huff, as the daughter of a deaf and dumb lock keeper does excellent work. There are many beautiful scenes along a canal and about the locks. There is quite an element of heart interest and some strong acting in the ending. The supporting cast is made up of able artists and the picture will please any audience.

IN OLD VIRGINIA (Lubin), October 8.—The plot of this two-part picture drama is located in the South during the war of "sixty-one," and the principal characters are made up of members of aristocratic families. There are many strong emotional scenes occuring through the two reels, but the whole picture is marred with several weak and unconvincing battle scenes. Lawrence McCloskey is the author and John E. Ince directs and plays the leading character, and does it well. The acting of the others in the cast deserve mention. The photography is up to the mark. It seems to please.

THE REAL AGATHA (Essanay), October 9.—This two-part picture play has been reviewed at length by James McQuade in the Moving Picture World and can be found on page 1625, issue of September 19, 1914. A finely acted, refined comedy-drama.

THE LONG WAY (Edison), October 9.—This three-part picture play has been reviewed at length by Louis Reeves Harrison in the Moving Picture World and can be found on page 1625, issue of September 19, 1914.

THE ROSE AND THE THORN (Vitagraph), October 10.—A special feature in two parts, of an allegorical nature, with a double exposure in the film showing "Folly," demonstrating that a flirt is a rose, from which every one takes a petal, the thorns remaining for her future husband; at least this is the title at the beginning of the picture. At the ending the exception proves the rule, but at a terrible cost and dangerously close figuring. Naomi Childers is the flirt, and one almost wishes that the story might have had a different ending. The finale of this picture is disappointing, nevertheless it is interesting in its development throughout, and is a beautiful production scenically and finely acted.

THE GIRL AND THE STOWAWAY (Kalem), Oct. 12.—A two-part romantic comedy, written by C. Doty Hobart and produced by Kenean Buel. The plot is not new or original, but it is handled in a clever manner. The majority of the scenes are located on board a liner, and concerns a stowaway who is of noble birth. There is a thrilling rescue scene, which results in the exposure of the stowaway's identity. Alice Joyce and William Bestman have the principal roles. This is an excellent release.

THE DREAM GIRL (Selig), Oct. 12.—A two-part picture drama. The opening scenes are rather more sentimental than convincing, but it develops rapidly, especially in the second reel, into intense melodrama, in which love and adventure intermingle. Tom Santschi and Bessie Eyton, supported by other Selig players, portray their various characters adequately. While in some scenes the action is almost absurd, others have a redeeming balancing quality that pleases the audiences.

Independent

THE UNPAINTED PORTRAIT (Majestic), Oct. 6.—Good photography and construction, but unpleasant theme. A man deserts his wife because the coming child is "too great an added burden." The wife dies, the father falls in love with his own daughter later, and on finding out who she is commits suicide.

THE BENEVOLENCE OF CONDUCTOR 786 (Thanhouser), Oct. 9.—On the same reel with "Lizards of the Desert." Simple and charming and full of real heart interest also a decided thrill when the conductor saves the child from being run over by the trolley. This last incident has been worked up in a very novel and pleasing way.

LIZARDS OF THE DESERT (Thanhouser), Oct. 9.—On the same reel as "The Benevolence of Conductor 786." Excellent views of the collared lizard, the horned toad, which is really a lizard also, and the gila monster, the only poisonous lizard known.

THE ONE WHO CARED (Princess), Oct. 9.—The old story of the test. Two men in love with the doctor's daughter and he tests their courage by offering them pills, one of which is supposed to be poison. Nothing new, but prettily done.

THE TARDY CANNONBALL (Reliance), Oct. 10.—An excellent two-reel story that keeps you in suspense from start to finish and winds up in an entirely novel and pleasing way. The "cannon ball" is an express train that is late and so gives the station agent the opportunity to play seven up with a waiting passenger who turns out to be not only his old pal but his enemy also. The surprise at the end is quite equal to an O. Henry story.

BILL SPOILS A VACATION (Komic), Oct. 11.—Bill Series No. 8. Good, clean comedy very well done.

THE NEGLECTED WIFE (Universal Ike), October 6.—A story of a neglected young wife who puts a detective on her husband's trail. Her father does likewise and both detectives disguise themselves like the husband. This leads to some amusing complications. Louis Glaum and Ray Gallagher are the married couple, who find happiness after much trouble.

ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 135, October 7.—Views of the peace demonstration at Grant's Tomb, New York; pictures of American League champions and European war scenes are shown in this number.

THE LITTLE BLONDE LADY (Rex), October 11.—A clever comedy number in which Ella Hall plays younger sister. Robert Leonard is the young broker who is temporarily ruined. In this time the older sister gives him up and he learns to love the younger. This is well photographed, nicely acted and has an effective little comedy plot.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 39 (Reliance), October 12. This portion of Margaret's adventures is written by Arthur James. It continues the girl's experiences with Miss Hamilton's brother, who holds her up with a shot gun, thinking she is a lady burglar. The treatment of these situations is light but quite pleasing.

WINSOME WINNIE (Beauty), October 13.—This boarding house comedy number is nicely photographed but the story is not strong. The young man plans numerous ways to win the girl against her father's wishes. He finally gets a friend to plant some counterfeit money with the old man and then comes to the rescue. A story of average merit.

DOWN BY THE SEA (American), October 14.—A story of the seacoast with Ed Coxen, George Field and Winifred Greenwood in the cast. The girl and fisher lad are in love until the city man appears. The girl's heart turns to the latter and the fisher lad manfully leaves when he learns the status of affairs. There is not very much feeling in some of the scenes. The photography is attractive.

ZIPP, THE DODGER (Keystone), October 17.—The Fat Boy appears in this as the young man who dodges baseballs at a resort concession. A colored boy is substituted while he pretends to be a young man of leisure, but the girl happens along later and discovers what Fatty's job really is. This is quite pleasing.

CARMEN'S WASHDAY (Sterling), October 19.—This starts out with a number of children, but later older people appear in the cast. The bad boy, who put dirt on Carmen's clean clothes, succeeds in starting a neighborhood rumpus. There are amusing moments in this, but the plot itself is very slight.

DASH, LOVE AND SPLASH (Keystone), October 19.—A half-reel eccentric comedy in which the rivals fight over a girl. The plot is choppy and only fairly amusing.

SANTA CATALINA (Keystone), October 19.—This, on same reel with above, gives some attractive views of the celebrated marine gardens on Catalina island and also numerous pictures of the beautiful surroundings.

THE RICE INDUSTRY (Victor), October 19.—A good educational subject, demonstrating how rice is grown in Georgia. Plowing, harrowing, planting, flooding, cutting and threshing are all shown. The photographs are a shade dark in places, but the reel is entertaining and instructive.

VIVIAN'S TRANSPORTATION (Crystal), October 20.—A low comedy number of about average appeal. The girl and her father go to the beach for an outing. A female detective and an ignited bomb keep the rather slight plot boiling. The splendid photography does much to retain the interest in this.

THE GATES OF LIBERTY (Imp), October 22.—A "Universal Boy" number. Young Matty visits Ellis Island and assists an immigrant and his wife to get into this country. The views at Ellis Island are interesting and the plot is quite entertaining.

CUPID PULLS A TOOTH (Nestor), October 23.—A comedy number featuring Eddie Lyons and Victoria Forde. Eddie plays the young dentist and wreaks a promise that he may marry the girl from the reluctant father in his dental chair. The idea in this is lightly amusing and handled in a way that makes the film a pleasing one.

HAROLD'S TOUPEE (Royal), October 24.—Louis Simon has the lead in this comedy, the point of which is that a bald-headed man may win a wife. The story should be satisfying to these similarly handicapped; others may not find it particularly interesting.

WHEN THEIR WIVES JOINED THE REGIMENT (Joker), October 24.—A mixture of farce and burlesque in which the two wives decide to join the military company. They do so, but it is discovered they are women and they are glad to get back to wifely duties at home. This has amusing moments, but is not highly successful.

SMALLPOX ON THE CIRCLE U (Eclair), October 25.—This comedy offering dresses up a familiar idea in a new way. The ranch foreman uses red ink on the Chinaman so the other boys will be quarantined while he makes love to the girl. But the young doctor spoils his scheme. The photographs are very good and the cast a pleasing one.

CINDER ELFRED (Hepworth).—The action in this comedy is based on what happens to a young man in a dream, although we are unaware that it is not the real thing. Tom Powers is the player who, while chatting with a young woman, is deprived of his outer clothing and finds himself surrounded only by a small amount of underwear and a large number of people. When he makes his escape with a portiere about him he collides with a policman. As he falls he wakes up. Later when he goes to the sure-enough party he finds himself sitting with the same young woman. His hilarity as he thinks of the dream causes the young woman to be a bit peevish. There are some laughs in this single reel.

THE RESCUE (Thanhouser), Oct. 11.—A very pretty, well-constructed comedy-drama, that is sure to please. A woman, jealous of the perfectly innocent friendship between her husband and her sister, is rescued by that sister from a burning boat and all ends happily. Some of the swimming, diving and boating scenes are very beautiful.

THE WARNING (Majestic), Oct. 13. The story of a wilful girl who dreams she takes her own way, gets betrayed and tries twice to commit suicide and wakes to find she has nearly broken her head in tumbling out of the hammock. A good, clean story with a moral and an element of farce in it.

Independent Specials

THE RUNAWAY FREIGHT (Reliance), September 26.—An unusually live railroad story in two reels. Eugene Paulette and Francelia Billington play the leads and there is a clever little girl in the story, which is well photographed throughout. Paulette plays the part of a reformed hobo. Two of his old pals stir up a number of exciting conflicts in which the hero protects the girl and the station from harm. The wreck of the two freight cars in the last reel is more realistic. The story is well constructed and has plenty of action. A good offering of its type.

LOVE AND BASEBALL (101 Bison), October 3.—This is the first of a series of two-reel pictures featuring the famous pitcher, Christy Matthewson. The numbers will each be complete and issued once a month for a year. This introduces Christy in a lot of intimate views, showing how he neglects business to play ball on a corner lot. Later he is seen getting his first try-out on the Polo grounds, New York. There is of course a love story thrown in. This series starts out appealingly and fans all over the country will greet Christy in the pictures with pleasure. This first number is a pleasing one.

SANDS OF FATE (Majestic), October 11.—A two-reel romance of the desert country, except for a few of the opening scenes which occur in the East. The hero sees Helen kiss Holden, his rival, in a darkened conservatory. He does not know she mistook Holden for himself and his rival allows the error to stand. Later in the West comes a readjustment of their lives, Holden sacrificing himself for their happiness. The desert scenes are beautifully pictured, but the characters gave no great illustration of the suffering they were supposed to undergo. More feeling in some of the scenes would have helped greatly. It is, however, a very attractive production as it stands.

MIRAGE (Gold Seal), October 20.—In this 12th episode of "The Trey O'Hearts" Judith is discovered riding across the desert tied lengthwise on Hopi's horse. Alan pursues her and Rose and Barcus later arrive on the scene. The desert views are picturesque and the trick horse does some interesting work. The motives animating the various characters have become a trifle vague and this is particularly noticeable in this instalment, though the interest is still maintained.

THE VIOLINIST (Eclair), October 21.—A two-reel drama based on a familiar theme, nicely pictured and well acted throughout. Carol Halloway doubles in the part of mother and daughter. First as a young girl she marries Enrico, the violinist, against her father's wishes. F. Sumner handles the leading role very creditably. He goes back to Italy and becomes famous, but years of separation ensue. He returns to America later as a street musician. His meeting with his daughter and subsequent regeneration is prettily developed. A sincerely presented and appealing story.

SHORTY AND SHERLOCK HOLMES (Broncho), October 21.—Imitations of Sherlock Holmes are becoming very numerous, but Shorty Hamilton manages to get some fun out of it in this two-reel number. The cowboys fake a robbery and in trying to trace this down Shorty discovers some real bandits and gets their loot, thus becoming the town hero. The photography is good and the story runs along in an entertaining manner. It makes altogether a better ranch comedy than the average.

THE POWER OF THE ANGELUS (Domino), October 22.—A two-reel number by Ince and Clifford, full of the sunshine of California in the early mission days. The Don's daughter falls in love with an adventurer from Spain and deserts her lover to wed him. The lover is greatly downcast and joins the monks. Later he saves the sacred chalice from the hands of the adventurer and his gang of bandits. The girl in the meantime rings the angelus bells. An attractive production, somewhat resembling former offerings by this company. The close has a pathetic touch, as the original lovers cannot be reunited.

OLAF ERICKSON, BOSS (Rex), October 22.—Another two-reel number featuring Robert Leonard as the Big Swede in a lumber camp. He first appears as a bully the terror of the camp. Later the girl, played by Ella Hall, appears. She slaps Olaf's face a few times, winning his love and respect at one and the same time. The girl's father turns out to be a criminal and is shot later in the picture. The camp setting is pleasing and this makes an entertaining out-of-door number.

THE SPARK ETERNAL (Kaybee), October 23.—A two-reel story beginning in the slum districts. Dan is a member of the Gopher gang and his sweetheart, Lola, is also of this social strata. She is injured in a police raid on a dance hall and taken to a hospital. The doctor and his wife become interested in her and take her to their home. From this point she and Dan take leave of the old life and the girl saves the home from being robbed by the gang. This makes an entertaining story and leaves a good impression with the observer. It is well constructed and appealing.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS (Powers), October 24.—A two-reel story featuring Pauline Bush, William Dowlin and others. The girl's grandmother tells her the story of her mother's unfortunate marriage, how the father had deserted her and left her to die. Later the grandmother dies and the girl goes to seek her father. Before finding him she falls in love with the manager of a theatrical company, to whom she returns later. This offering is peculiar in construction, and while not uninteresting contains much of a semi-morbid character. It lacks bright, attractive scenes and is brought to a very abrupt close. The acting and photography are good.

LOVE AND SURGERY (L. K. O.), October 25.—A two-reel number introducing a new company for the first time in slapstick humor of an uproarious sort. Billy Ritchie and Henry Lehrmann make an immediate hit as a pair of flirtatious "ginks." The first scenes are taken in a park and the latter ones in a hospital. There are some screamingly funny things in this, but the fun is of the roughest sort such as squirting water from the mouth, kicking a woman in the stomach, tearing off a woman's dress and the like. There is no connected plot, but merely a series of rough-house scenes from start to finish. None of the scenes are impossible and this will no doubt prove successful before audiences that are not overly particular.

HIS HEART, HIS HAND AND HIS SWORD (Victor), October 26.—This is the first of a series of adventure stories featuring J. Warren Kerrigan as Terence O'Rourke, a soldier of fortune. These are adapted from stories by Louis Joseph Vance, by Jacques Jaccard, and each adventure is to be complete in itself, with a certain continuity of interest. Some of the photography in the first reel is not up to standard, but is very good in the second. This part fits Kerrigan admirably and promises to be a successful offering judging by the first number. Vera Sisson plays the princess, who calls on Terence for aid on behalf of her brother, against whom she thinks there is a conspiracy. Future instalments should prove interesting.

THE BORROWED HYDROPLANE (Thanhouser), Oct —.—This is the fifteenth episode of "The Million Dollar Mystery." It continues the general interest of the series, the chief feature being Jim's dash in a hydroplane to rescue the girl from a fleeing motor boat. This makes an interesting exhibition of the manner in which this invention works and James Cruze and Florence La Badie seem very much at home in this type of machine. One of the gang of conspirators is captured while trying to get hold of the box containing the million DRAWN INTO THE QUICKSAND (Thanhouser), October —.The sixteenth episode of "The Million Dollar Mystery." Braine and his gang get hold of the heroine in a hotel. Braine impersonates a doctor and says she has smallpox. They are about to take her to the pest house when Norton substitutes another girl. During the escape the heroine gets into quicksand. Norton climbs a telegraph pole, goes hand over hand across the cable and throws down a rope, by which he pulls her out. This makes an enjoyable and exciting number.

SAVING THE COLORS (Cosmofotofilm).—This is a story made by the Regent company of England. It is in three parts. There is a war background, in which are shown men in battle, portraying British and French troops in conflict with Germans. The underlying action is the marriage of a trained nurse to a well-to-do good-for-nothing. The friends of the latter ridicule the nurse and otherwise comport themselves in a manner uncomplimentary to that division of a community known as Society. That the husband finally realizes his culpability and goes to the front does something to rehabilitate him in the opinion of the observer. Many men are used in the battle scenes; undoubtedly they are soldiers, not actors. The Americans may be more interested in the latter part of the frequently mentioned combination of king and country, inseparable though the two may be in the English mind. So, too, exhibitors may be chary of the title making reference to the annihilation of the Germans. The story is not of notable strength.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 64 (Pathe).—Good views of the Princeton Freshman-Sophomore class rush; the Siasconset Marconi wireless station recently closed by the U. S. Government; Chicago's municipal markets; the Columbus caravels leaving Eria, Pa., for Chicago; the mobilization of the Montenegrin second army crops at Scutari, and the peace demonstration in New York City.

JAILBIRDS (American), Oct. 12.—A two-reel story, very well told of a man convicted of manslaughter in self-defense escapes from jail but later gives up his liberty in order to clear a young girl unjustly accused of theft. Of course she waits for him and everything ends happily.

Photoplast.

Interesting Exhibition of a Motion Picture Novelty Given at a New Haven Theater.

By F. H. Richardson.

THE name of Charles E. Schneider, Springfield, Mass., would mean nothing to the photoplay world as a whole, but to the New England exhibitor and operator it is as familiar as his own front door, because Schneider is one of the largest New England dealers in projection machines and accessories. His main office is located at Springfield, Mass., with a branch at New Haven, Conn.

Some time ago Mr. Schneider decided to use up a portion of his surplus wealth in paying a visit to Germany. This he did, and, after some weeks spent in renewing friendship and acquaintanceship, he returned to America, as they all do. But Schneider, in the course of his visit, has acquired a bug, and it was the buggiest kind of a bug, too. He was talking about it when he came into our office; he talked about it while he was there, and he went out talking about it. The subject was "plastic pictures," which he had seen demonstrated over in the Fatherland. Shortly thereafter, having inoculated some business friends with a portion of his enthusiasm, he returned to Germany to look further into the internal arrangement of his "bug" and to acquire the necessary American rights therein.

All this was duly accomplished, and on Friday, October 2, the writer was invited to visit New Haven and witness a demonstration, or, in other words, to watch Brother Schneider's bug crawl for the first time, Schneider, being convinced that the crawl would be quickly changed to a lofty flight which would astonish the photoplay world. We did not know exactly what we were going to see. Mr. Schneider had tried to explain the matter to us, but did not make much of a success of it. However, we decided to take a chance, and journeyed up to the Wooden Nutmeg State where, in a small hall, a selected audience foregathered to witness the performance.

To say that we were surprised would not even begin to express it. The demonstration was crude, the film being a home-made affair and not very well suited to that kind of work, but, nevertheless, I do not think there was a man in that audience who was not both delighted and amazed at the result attained. The thing is not, in our opinion, applicable to the motion picture theater. It is a vaudeville stunt, though it may have other side lines of importance: but it requires a stage setting, and, moreover, only films made purposely for photoplast can be utilized.

The film used must be absolutely opaque, except for the figures themselves, which may either be in black and white or in colors. The performance is in the nature of an illusion, but it is startlingly realistic. It is as though the figures actually lived and moved on the stage. In the demonstration a man marched out, set up an easel announcing the act, and then two figures appeared, dancing the modern dances. In one scene it was two men; in the other a man and a woman. The figures were rounded out and absolutely life-like. One theater manager present, after rubbering at the thing for a minute, spoke right out in meeting as follows: "Aw, that thing is a fake. That ain't projection. It's some trick; those men are up there on the stage"—which I think you will admit is going some for a projected image.

I said this was not applicable to the motion picture theater. Well, perhaps I had better not be too fast after all. I do not at present see how it can be worked out to apply to regular moving picture theater work, but, looking back over the past, I can remember a number of things which you and I announced as impracticable for certain purposes which are now in everyday use for those same purposes. As I see it now, however, this photoplast is limited to vaudeville, but it will be a big, big timer. You may take it from me that when the thing is put on right it will have the audience guessing, and guessing good and plenty, too. It is not difficult to stage, and Brother Schneider has all that end of it worked out to the last detail.

I, for one, shall await the advent of photoplast (the name with which Schneider has christened the new photoplay baby) with much interest, and if I know when and where its first performance is given in New York I will be there fully prepared to watch the audience sit right square up in their seats and take notice when it is thrown on the screen, and to hear the male portion of the audience gasp: "Well, what the dickens is that!" and the lady element remark to each other: "Dear me, what'll they be doing next?"

"Where the Trail Divides"

A Lasky Feature of Western Flavor With Robert Edeson in the Leading Role.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THE acting of an artist of Robert Edeson's calibre must always be an asset, and it is the one big asset of this filmplay. The outdoor settings have been selected with excellent taste and the Indian scenes are finely conceived and finely carried out. The vim and dash of the early scenes, the spirited action and the splendid scenery raise the spectators' hopes to great heights.

The prologue to the story is told briefly and powerfully. A little white girl is saved by an Indian boy a few years her senior. Fifteen years later the white girl and the Indian boy are lovers and the theme of the play begins in earnest. Here the high hopes inspired by the early part are scarcely sustained; the direction at times is halting, obviously not quite sure of its ground, and when the whole story has finally passed before our eyes we cannot fail to see how much stronger it might have been made by judicious trimming. There are many rough edges, the result of unskillful dovetailing. It must be said, too, that the photography is not of the very best; there are occasional spaces of flat photography and one or two scenes which seem dark. At times, too, the camera was too far away from the scenes that should have stood out with distinctness.

The theme of the story offered extraordinary possibilities, though it is by no means new. The scenario develops a new and striking phase of the old conflict between two hostile and irreconcilable conceptions of life, based upon racial differences. The white girl with a love born in part of childhood memories and in part of admiration of the Indian's natural nobility of character and strength agrees to marry and actually does marry the Indian.

Winifred Kingston in the role of the settler's daughter and the adopted child of her uncle, Colonel William Lander, had a difficult task to perform. She acquitted herself well on the whole, though at times she seemed lacking in depth and energy. The marriage between the red man and the white woman which has roused the opposition of all the friends and neighbors turns out a sad experiment. The white woman cannot bear to be classed as a squaw; the tempter appears in a white villain who whispers to her of the joys and pleasures of the white man's life in the great cities east of the Rockies. The Indian with rare self-sacrifice renounces his rights to the white woman and bids her to go with his rival, warning the latter to "treat her well" on pain of summary execution.

The white woman, born and bred in the far West, shows to little advantage in the cultured society of the East. She provokes at first the anger and then the disgust of her new husband, who forgets the Indian's injunction to treat the girl well. The Indian, warned by the abused wife, comes East and makes the husband behave. He takes the wife back to the West. The situation here becomes somewhat complicated through the fact that oil has been discovered upon the land which the Indian had deeded to his wife. The white husband wants to get hold of this valuable land and tries to steal the deed which it appears has never been recorded. Just how the husband was in a position to become owner of the property by recording a deed granted to his wife is not clearly explained. At any rate the villain does not succeed and is killed in the commission of a crime.

With the villain out of the way the white woman and the red man renew their pledges of love and go in search of the "trail of happiness." All of which makes a very pretty ending.

Judged by the high standard of Lasky filmplays this feature does not completely meet expectations.

Apex War Pictures Harmless

Judge Seawell of the Superior Court Grants Order Enjoining San Francisco Police from Stopping Them.

THE case of P. P. Craft, of the Apex Film Company, against D. A. White, Chief of Police, and Peter A. Peshon, corporal of police, in charge of the moving picture censor board, was tried recently before Judge Seawell in Department I of the Superior Court, San Francisco. Apex Film Company distributed films representing battle scenes and troop manouevers in the present European War. In August last Chief White directed his subordinates to suppress these pictures and the several moving picture theaters of the city were notified by the police captains of the chief's orders. The Apex Film Company applied for an injunction against the chief and his police force and Corporal Peshon from interfering with the exhibition of the pictures.

Judge Seawell asked that the pictures or photographs of the scenes be shown to enable him to ascertain whether such pictures were unlawful. His honor stated that in his opinion only obscene, indecent or immoral pictures could be suppressed by the police department, and he held that nothing in the pictures could be called obscene, indecent or immoral or in violation of any law or any ordinance.

At the close of the trial Judge Seawell stated that he could see no difference between the exhibition of the moving pictures in controversy and the illustrations of battle scenes he looks at every day in public newspapers. He then ordered judgment against the chief of police, perpetually enjoining him and his police force from further interference with the exhibition of these pictures.

NEW ALCO EXCHANGE AT DALLAS.

LUBIN SERIAL A SUCCESS.

The success of the Lubin Serial, "The Beloved Adventurer," is beyond expectations, says the Lubin folk. Five of the stories have been released so far and the cry is for more. The enormous sale of the book which tells the adventures of the good Lord Cecil in novel form has created an abnormal desire to see the pictures. The output of the Monday feature has more than doubled any other single reel that the Lubin Company has ever released.

"The Man of the Hour"

Powerful Picturization of American Political Life Given by Robert Warwick—World Film Release.

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

This picture is a photodramatization of the famous play by George Broadhurst dealing with modern political corruption, and is the fourth of the William A. Brady features to be released by the World Film Corporation. That it will meet with the success of its original on the legitimate stage there can hardly be any doubt. Not only is the picture story equally forcible and true to life as the stage version, but the picture allows of many little bits of characterization and detail, necessarily omitted before the footlights, that greatly enhance the human heart interest of the story and bring before us most vividly the reality of the characters as human beings.

Scene from "The Man of the Hour" (World Film).

The actors from Robert Warwick, who created the part and plays the central character in both play and photodrama, down to the sneak thief, butlers, aldermen and other supers, have made the most of their opportunity in a very intelligent and gratifying way and except on rare occasions make us forget that they are actors and actresses. Especially good are Ned Burton as the corrupt political boss, Eric Mayne as the unscrupulous financier and false friend, Alec B. Francis as the trusting and ruined father of the "man of the hour," and Belle Adair as the heroine. Mention should also be made of the two western characters, Chester Barrett as the hero's "pal" and Thomas Jackson as the sheriff.

Scene from "The Man of the Hour" (World Film).

The exteriors are very well chosen and some of them are extremely beautiful. The interiors are also noteworthy for their fidelity to the atmosphere and tone of the story and especially remarkable are the convention hall where the man of the hour makes his campaign speech and the council room of the board of aldermen where the fight on the franchise bill is played. Political plays as a rule have on the screen a farcical element due to the fact that the settings in which they are played are manifestly unreal. The undoubted genuineness of the settings in "The Man of the Hour" eliminate this element and force home to the spectator in a most telling way the reality of what is being enacted.

"A World Without Men"

A Three-Reel Pathe Farce Giving the Love Story of Three Maids Who Wanted to Be Men-Haters.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is much that is fresh and new in this three-reel Pathe offering of German make and it is quite sure to be an acceptable feature offering. It has a thread of humor running through it which grows bright and sparkling often, and at no time falls into dull flatness. The story, which deals with three maiden man-haters, and how they fall in love, holds with fair suspense, and in it there is just a touch of "spice" which will add to its popularity; but which is not objectionable. It has nothing markedly vulgar in it.

Scene from "A World Without Men" (Pathe).

The quality of the offering comes mostly from the comedy ability of the players and specially of the heroine, as played, a young woman of vigorous mind and, of the three would-be old maids, the most determined man-hater. We find her in the opening scenes refusing a job as stenographer because "no man could dictate" to her. One evening when the three are at home and "at their ease," a man in fear of his life walks in and asks asylum. They let him get safely away by crawling across their ironing board to the next apartment. This man becomes the hero of the story. The leading maid gets a job in a law office of which he, though at that time out of town, is a partner. The senior partner falls in love with her and so does the chief clerk. The latter gets fresh and she has him fired. She then gets one of the other girls a job in the office and this one falls in love with the second clerk. The third girl has got a job in a hospital and is the sweetheart of a doctor. These two keep their love affairs quiet for fear of the first girl. But she, too, really loves the younger boss and at length gives in to her feelings and is caught by the others letting him make love to her.

The action is distinctly farcical all through; but it doesn't degenerate into rough knock-about stuff, and is the more amusing on that account. The scenes are well handled and clearly photographed. It is a laugh-maker without being "a scream" and is a pretty safe offering.

WOULD BAN WAR PICTURES IN SAN FRANCISCO.

At a meeting of the Police and Judiciary Committees of the Board of Supervisors, San Francisco, on October 2, a recommendation was passed that an ordinance be drawn up prohibiting the exhibition of war pictures in theaters during the remainder of the present European war. Representatives of film exchanges were on hand and the proposed action was opposed, the contention being made that such an ordinance would be discriminatory. The matter will be taken up by the Board of Supervisors at an early date.

"The Ticket of Leave Man"

APPARENTLY Pathe believes that the day of the adaptation as such is drawing to a close and that already the advertising force of "An adaptation from the famous" has passed away. This picture is not a photodramatization of the play entitled "The Ticket of Leave Man," but an adaptation of Charles Reade's novel, "Foul Play," and the melodrama Pathe has recently picturized under the title "Detective Craig's Coup."

The picture differs quite a little in places from the fiction story, but it is exceptionally well told and interesting, and clear except in one place, namely as to the feigned gold shipment and the plot to scuttle the ship. As it stands it is not quite clear how Allen expects to profit by the felony, because nothing is said about the insurance and secret transference of the real gold to another ship which brings it safely home.

Scene from "The Ticket of Leave Man" (Pathe).

The characterization is excellent and leaves nothing to be desired. M. O. Penn, as the old merchant, has rather a slight part, but he has carried it off with the same force and finish that he puts into everything he does. The three principals, Sheldon Lewis, Harold Meltzer and Helena Gerard put a force and reality into their parts that makes them decidedly enthralling, while Hatch and Ryan as the general and the mate leave nothing to be desired.

"Dough and Dynamite"

First of the Coming Two-Reel Keystone Releases—Good Slapstick Comedy Well Constructed.

This picture, which is to be released on October 26, is the first of the long-promised two-reel Keystone comedies that are to be released hereafter at regular intervals. So far as the story itself it could easily have been told in a half reel, but there is a genuine laugh in nearly every scene and the picture is one of the cleanest ones that Keystone has done.

The scene of the story is a combined bakery and restaurant elaborately constructed with three rooms, shop, restaurant and kitchen on the street level, and two bakerooms in the cellar. In all of these and in the back yard, the "goat" gets into all kinds of trouble. He is a waiter and when the bakers go on strike the proprietor makes him take their places. The strikers buy a loaf of bread, put a dynamite cartridge inside of it and then return it to the shop as being too heavy. The waiter-baker chucks in into the oven to cook some more and then after a while things happen. The explosion of course wrecks everything and the last views we have are of the proprietor digging himself out of the debris of bricks and mortar that was once the bake oven and of the "goat's" head slowly emerging from a great mass of dough that completely envelopes him.

PATHESCOPES IN DETROIT DEPARTMENT STORE.

The Pathescope Sales Company, of Detroit, Mich., of which Francis Reno is manager, has opened an office at 501 Dime bank building, that city, for the sale of the Pathescope and other similar products manufactured by Pathe Freres. Mr. Reno has been connected with the Pathes since they started to manufacture the Pathescope. He has already arranged to send a corps of salesmen through Michigan, and within a week after the office was opened he placed several machines. He has arranged for the sale of the Pathescope with Heyn's Bazaar, one of Detroit's leading department stores. This store has fitted up a curtain over the main entrance on the interior and is giving daily demonstrations, the pictures being thrown from a mezzanine balcony. The concern will not only handle the machines but likewise films, and will keep a large stock in the library for the users of the Pathescope. Mr. Reno has a number of other large retail stores through the city and state negotiating for the sale of these machines. While for the present Mr. Reno will devote his attention to Michigan only, he undoubtedly will take additional territory later on.

"DEAD SEAT" PROBLEM SOLVED (?)

F. A. Bristol and M. S. McMullen, of the Bristol Manufacturing Company of Chicago, recently had an exhibition at the Hotel Arthur in Aurora their patent seat-indicating device which they claim will solve for the exhibitor the problem of "dead seats." Electric lights placed on the seats, on the walls above each row or at the side of the aisles mark plainly the seats which are unoccupied. A patron coming in from the back can tell at a glance by the burning signals just what seats are vacant. A pressure of twenty pounds on the seat breaks the connection and the light is extinguished.

"The Loves, Adventures and Life of William Shakespeare"

Trans-Oceanic Six-Reel Picture of Great Historic and Educational Value—Sawyer Release.

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

Great and well-known as is the name of Shakespeare, the man as a man and the events of his life, which made him what he was and led him to undertake the work that has produced one of the world's greatest dramatists are comparatively little known except to students, and yet so full are they with the pathos and humor and tragedy and heart interest that he later put into his plays and poetry, that everyone will be glad to have them brought within the reach of the common ken.

In more ways than one this has been remarkably well done in the Sawyer release, which is in no sense a biography of Shakespeare, but as its title indicates rather a portrayal of the romance and poetry of his youth and early manhood. In reality it is the story of his love for the beautiful and gentle Charlotte Clopton who died young, and for the pretty, shy, idyllic albeit shrewish Anne Hathaway whom he afterwards married and whose sharp tongue drove him first to the Lucy Arms tavern and later to the road to become the "roaming player" who was to entrance both his own world and the nations then unborn. Then comes the climax in his rise to fame, the celebrated performance of his "Romeo and Juliet" in the Blackfriars Theater by royal command, his subsequent presentation at court, and finally, as he slumbers with his congratulating and merry-making friends, the visions of the children of his brain that have risen up and crowned him with an immortal laurel wreath.

As can readily be seen the undertaking is a most ambitious one and on the whole the results in production are remarkably good, despite the fact that the story is a little too long drawn out and sketchy in the last two reels and that the photography might have been better. The papist plot against the life of Queen Elizabeth has also been handled crudely and inaccurately and in such a way that it is likely to shock Roman Catholics of today both here and in Canada, although the spirit of the treatment is quite in keeping with the ideals and spirit of Englishmen. We understand, however, that the print we saw was an imperfect copy of the original negative, which is now owned by the Sawyer Company. A careful revision of this negative is now being made so as to adapt the story to American and Canadian ideals and way of looking at things, and as all of the blemishes, except perhaps some of the photographic ones, can easily be remedied in this way, the story promises to be one of the best of the many good things put on the market by that company.

The exterior locations of the picture are taken in the real vale of Avon where Shakespeare lived, and the greatest pains has been taken to reproduce in costumes, properties and settings the actual atmosphere of the old Elizabethan life. Consequently even were the blemishes of the picture much greater than they are, it would still be of enormous educational value, and when its revision by the capable hands that now own it is completed this value will be increased incalculably and the picture should rank as one of the great productions of a great year.

Close Calls of American Cameraman

Arrested First by Germans and Released, the Next Morning He Is Taken in by the French As a Spy.

WRITING in the Evening Sun, Leonora Raines describes the experiences of an unnamed young American cameraman who was ambitious to get genuine war pictures. He started out from Paris on a bicycle with a diary, a passport, his apparatus slung across his shoulder. All went well until the afternoon of the second day of a quick run from Paris. He saw several sentries, but these men, not dreaming but the fellow on the wheel had something to do with the army, did not stop him.

All day he had been hearing the sound of cannon and shot and had been dodging shrapnel. Then of a sudden he found himself riding in the midst of shot and saw lines of soldiers on the hills all about. So the soldiers called to him to halt, which he did, realizing what would happen if he didn't. He did not understand what was said to him, so he got off his wheel. He was unceremoniously taken to some officers a mile or so away and an interpreter supplied. The men were all Germans, and he was in a wing of the army of the Kaiser. The officers laughed at his impudence, which they called "American brass," and after examining all papers, stripping him, reading his diary from start to finish, they at last turned over all his papers and ordered him away.

He rode back, but to the left, and the next morning was arrested by a French sentinel as a spy. He had set up his machine to catch a line of soldiers as they passed, and was actually beginning to turn the crank when the apparatus was knocked over and he was hauled to the officers. Men who spoke German tried to draw out the intruder in order to surprise him into "giving himself away;" but the American was genuinely ignorant of any language save his own. For two days and nights he was kept as a German spy and treated as such, sleeping by himself on the straw, with two guards watching, each armed with pistol and bayonet.

When it began to dawn on the officers that the man was no spy, but just a good American citizen in search of adventure and films for his machine, he was treated more leniently. Then he slept among the soldiers, but had nothing but bread and water to eat. He marched at the end of the line and fell in with an Irishman who had somehow or other been taken prisoner, too, as he was in search of news for his Dublin paper. One day as they were all taking things easy a shout went up. "To arms!" Like everybody else, the American and Irishman jumped to their feet and in a moment fifty uhlans were on them. The latter were soon sent back. That afternoon the American was released. He insisted on his apparatus, which he finally got, also his diary, which had been translated by the officers; but his bicycle was never found.

"We made the acquaintance of this young man last week at Varreddes, where he had gone to take pictures of the battlefield," concludes the correspondent. "Indeed, the American is abroad in the land in spite of the fearful conflict. However, the vocation of the war correspondent is lost, for no one is allowed within thirty miles of a battle. No influence can be brought to bear on the Minister of War to permit one not actively engaged in the battle to be near. Even French correspondents are kept away."

"The Star of the Sea"

A Two-Reel Rex That Has Great Beauty—Story Is Striking and Fresh—Pauline Bush Makes Lovely Madonna.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE struggle between religion and passion in a sculptor who wants to begin work on a beautiful statue of the Madonna furnishes a theme for this two-reel offering that is far from being insignificant, indeed the story told in the picture is certain to interest widely and to hold well. The climax of the plot is a miracle in which the finished marble statue, opening her eyes, on the story's villainess and her accomplice about to commit a sacrilege, brings them kneeling repentant at her feet. There is nothing in the action that can offend the most sensitive patron. It is all handled in a way, so far as religion goes, that is quite conventional, although the story—admitting that there have been others somewhat like it—is artistically far from being merely commercial. It is an unusually pretty picture. Pauline Bush, widow of an Italian fisherman, who with her baby poses for the statue of the Madonna, gives a touch of transcendant loveliness to many of its scenes.

There is substantial truth of life in the situation. An artist, played by Mr. Fenton, is a nephew of a priest and has made a miniature statue of a Madonna and a cardinal has ordered a life-sized replica made for a church. The young sculptor is living a bohemian life with others of his kind and is the recognized lover of a model, played by Laura Oakley. The priest, his uncle, played by William Dowlan, bringing the commands of the cardinal to the studio finds a scene of revel and a fight going on between two of the models for the attention of the sculptor. Just before this it had been shown that the young man had been dreaming of the higher pleasures of working on his statue of the Madonna in the religious, clean-hearted atmosphere that such a work should of necessity create around him. He had fallen from this dream to the scenes of revel and when the priest comes with the message the sculptor is glad to escape from it all, to go home to the village and begin chiselling his Madonna.

He starts at first making it just like the little model, but is dissatisfied and asks his uncle to find him a living model, so he finds the fisherman's widow, played by Pauline Bush. There are several pictures of her seated on the rocks at the sea side, her baby in her arms and her old father, played by Mr. Brydon, standing near-by mending his nets. The child is a very happy choice and the widowed mother and he together make one of those pictures that must give the producer the greatest pleasure. The widow is loved by a fisherman, played by Lon Chaney. Just at this time a letter comes to the studio advising the sculptor that he has won a coveted prize for another work of art and the studio model takes this to him hoping to gain him again to the old ways; but is not successful. She joins forces with the widow's fisherman lover to work harm to the artist and his new model. She takes the fisherman into the church and tells him to break up with a sledge the new and beautiful statue. He lifts the hammer, but something in the statue forces him to draw back. He cannot bring himself to do it. The woman now attempts it and the stone statue opens its eyes. Both see this and, overwhelmed, fall at its feet. The bishop with his attendants coming to bless the new statue find the culprits kneeling and heart-broken.

There are things in this picture that stir the emotions deeply. The action all through and the ending are pleasing. The acting is simple, just what was wanted, and it makes the story effective. Many of the scenes are such that only an artist could have seen them and got them on the screen. The photography is very commendable.

BRENON PUTS ON "TRIAL BY JURY."

Herbert Brenon, Imp director, is staging a powerful two-reel drama, "Trial by Jury." The strongest scene in the play is enacted in a jury room, the jury having been locked in to decide the verdict. This is contended to be one of the best jury scenes ever produced, inasmuch as the actors participating therein were exceptionally fitted for their parts. The various conflicting emotions and individual mental struggles of the jurors are clearly portrayed all through. Violet Mersereau and William Shay play the leads.

THE PATH FORBIDDEN—A REAL NOVELTY.

With Octavia Handworth in "The Path Forbidden," the Excelsior Company have produced a picture that has proven to be a big surprise, and a revelation in double exposure. Miss Handworth, playing the dual role of the twin sisters, proved to be an ideal selection for the part, and this fact can be readily realized when you see her actually passing a card, dress, and other articles, to herself. The most startling feature of this picture is in the last reel, when you see her actually embrace herself in bed.

This film is the result of six years of constant mental study on the part of Harry Handworth, the Excelsior Company's chief director, who has successfully found the solution of this heretofore impossible mathematical problem.

"IMA SIMP," BALBOA COMEDY SERIES.

Marie Wayne and Ben Deely, stars of the comedy company formed at the Balboa studios, Long Beach, Cal., a month ago, have completed a series of mirthful releases concerning "Ima Simp, Detective," and are filming comedy-dramas, each one reel in length, the entire company appearing in "straight" costumes, Deely almost invariably posing as a millionaire in evening dress, while Miss Wayne's beauty is made even more attractive by Parisian gowns, gorgeous millinery creations and palatial indoor sets. William Wolbert, director of the company, enacts the heavy villain in the productions, and the other roles are ably portrayed by Charles Dudley, Archibald Warren, Nell Frantzen, Nan Christie, Suzanne Rogers, Myrtle Carruthers and Bruce Randall, with Joseph Z. Brotherton as the cinematographer.

MISSOURI VOTERS TO PASS ON CENSORSHIP.

The coming election in November will decide for St. Louis and the state of Missouri whether there is to be moving picture censorship. Mayor Kiel, of St. Louis, intends to submit such a bill to the City Council in the near future and a nominee for the state senate has adopted state censorship in his platform.

THERE is no million dollar mystery to be solved in this thriller, but the principal feat, around which is written a simple story, is a next-to-impossible performance—yet there it is before our very eyes. The camera does not lie, but the human optic is not so accurate—it has delusions. To all appearances, an extremely hazardous attempt is made to descend by rope from a flying machine upon a freight train traveling at full speed and the hero fireman does it. I was on the lookout for clever manipulation and failed to detect anything of the kind. Besides, there is no trickery about the way our heroic fireman runs along the tops of cars, traveling fast enough to make his life-insurance rate soar skyward.

Scene from "Out of the Air" (Majestic).

The fireman loves the engineer's elder daughter—the younger one is in braids, short skirts and skinny legs—and the elder daughter loves him. Even with father all is well until one day the young fireman loses his head in an emergency, and is accused of cowardice. He is discharged officially by the engineer and unofficially by the engineer's daughter, a very pretty girl, who acts as station agent in the engineer's home town. The girl is deeply grieved. The young man finds work as mechanician with an aviator at a station farther along the road. The girl grieves so that her little sister, she of the braids and skinny legs—neither she nor they appear in the cast—tries to brighten the weary hours of her elder sister. Their resources of amusement being rather limited, they try walking the track, and the pretty sister catches her foot in the frog of a switch.

Meanwhile, an escaped lunatic, a former railroad engineer, starts a still freight train miles away and jumps off the engine. Away flies the train. The girls struggle in vain to get released, the little one untying her sister's shoe and vainly attempting to throw the switch. Meanwhile, again, the train acquires momentum and tears along at a fearful rate. Little sister goes to the station and telegraphs to stop the train! Too late! The train is running wild and headed for where Mademoiselle Sweetness has her foot imprisoned. Is there no hope?

Then it is that news gets to the young fireman who has been dubbed a coward. He will save her. He and the aviator fly in pursuit of the wild train, taking with them a few yards of strong rope. Now the cut backs. Girl on track. Engine tearing along mercilessly, aeroplane gaining. There is a visible race between airship and cars. Hero attaches a rope to his waist and descends from aeroplane directly over the train. He is released on landing there and tears along recklessly to the engine. Back to the girl. All is lost. She falls in a faint when the runaway train bears down on her, but it is stopped only a few feet away. The young fireman jumps out of the cab and releases his loved one, with a reward well deserved.

MARY FULLER IN "THE WITCH GIRL" (Victor).

What is the secret of Mary Fuller's mysterious charm, her wonderful popularity? True, she is one of the most talked of, written about and advertised girls on the screen today, but these things are purely results. Rarely has a more subtle personality appeared on either the stage or screen. Likely this has much to do with it. And yet, Miss Fuller is a most finished artist, and one of the brainest little stars in filmdom. Is it brains, personality or talent which makes this girl what she is? Or is the combination of all three plus good plays? Who shall say. But here is Miss Fuller in the two-part play, "The Witch Girl." Miss Fuller is the unusual heroine—she is marvelous and the play is superb. This wild young heroine, roams the woods without regard to propriety, painfully innocent, but with a deeply implanted code of morals is an extraordinary person.

"The Witch Girl" will introduce Miss Fuller, star, to Universal patrons for the first time. And while the Universal predicts that it will show Miss Fuller more winsome, entertaining than ever before, and the play one of unusual quality.

Consider how is love won? Should you say that this drama describes a special case or is there something common to all women in the way of the "Witch Girl" with William Prentiss? She has illusions about him—she thought him fine and good—and then when he forced his lips to her's the awakening came. For the moment she hated him. And then—but one must see the picture to appreciate what happens when the unsuspected depths of a woman's nature are suddenly revealed to this big man, and how he readjusted his views of innocent girls—how he learned to repress his baser instincts in order to win this girl in the way she wanted to be won. Incidentally, one will learn a few things worth knowing. Charles Ogle supports Miss Fuller as Mr. Prentiss. Walter Edwin is the director. The play, in two parts, will be released October 30.

The Woman	Faye Cusick

THIS five-reel picture, made by Blache for the World Film Corporation, will be most heartily welcomed not only by lovers of Dickens, but by every photoplay fan as well. As is well known, Dickens died before he had finished the story and since then minds big and little have been trying to solve the questions left unanswered by the author. Terriss has now added his solution of the problem, and while, in order to bring about the "happy ending" he has adopted the less likely answer as to Drood's death or disappearance, he has added to the Dickens' literature an entirely novel and original reply to the query, "What became of John Jasper?"—an answer that in some ways is the most Dickensesque of all that have preceded it.

Scene from "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" (World Film).

The story is clear and well told and follows closely in its earlier portions the line of development followed by Dickens, perhaps a little too closely in this last respect as those who have not read the fiction story may have a little difficulty at first in realizing the relationships of the characters. On the other hand, the main mystery theme is so clearly and interestingly dealt with and the acting so nearly perfect that the spectator is held enthralled from beginning to end.

There are but two serious faults in the picture, one editorial, the other due to carelessness in production. The modern enameled iron bedstead that stares us in the face in the opium joint had no business to be there and detracts seriously from the enjoyment of an otherwise magnificently produced scene. Not only has Dickens carefully described the old-fashioned four-post bedstead that was in the joint, but the modern iron bed was unknown at the time in which Dickens laid his story. The other error is in the preparation for the solution of the mystery. The cathedral crypt scenes and the hiding of Drood's body are brought in at the end of the story as an absolute and rather jarring surprise. Dickens devotes several chapters as to how Jasper learned about the tombs and the quicklime and obtained the keys of the crypt and also the relations between Dachery and Durdles. These are important incidents and could easily have been inserted by enlarging the opium dreams of Jasper to include the visit to the crypt with Durdles and the purloining of the keys, and by a couple of scenes emphasizing Durdles' avocation of stonemason and his meeting with Datchery as Dickens has done. This would have immensely strengthened the argument for the solution offered as well as greatly clarified the story.

On the whole, however, for accuracy of detail, comprehensiveness of treatment and a delicate and definite interpretation of Dickens the picture will rank, with "Dante's Inferno" and "Quo Vadis" as among the great and remarkable achievements of the moving picture act.

Bursting Shells Don't Show on Films

So Declares Captain Cherry Kearton—Prefers Operating Mitrailleuse to Camera in War Time.

THE Antwerp correspondent of the London Daily News tells some of the experiences Captain Cherry Kearton has had in Belgium trying to secure photographs of war scenes. Captain Kearton, who is well known in this country, was the photographer who secured the pictures of Louvain, recently released here by Eclectic.

"I tried to get pictures of shells exploding while the battle at Alost was on," said the Captain, "but it was next to useless, for they hardly show on the film. In the trenches, too, it is useless—and rather brutal, it seems to me—to try to get pictures. For instance, we who have seen men die from bullets and shrapnel know quite well that they simply slip forward a little, and the whole thing is finished. They do not fling their rifles in the air and die in a posture; any pictures that show that may be known at once as faked.

"By the time I had finished trying to get pictures of shells exploding among the houses I saw it was time to get out; so I started off down the street with a Belgian. One thing was interesting; a dog and a cat followed us down the street, and as the shells burst the dog went dodging about from one side of the road to the other, but the cat never turned a hair. It minced along behind as if we were cat's-meat men. The dog made me nervous, but the cat was reassuring.

"Further down the whistle of shells came following us along again, trying to pick up the Belgian retreat; but before the 'Boom!' came that time I managed to break in the door of a shop and get inside. It is surprising what one will do in emergencies like that.

"Fortunately for the cat and dog it was a butcher's shop, and I thought they might as well have some meat as the Germans; so I handed them down a leg of veal and left them to it. Then I came out.

"When the war is over, I know a nice quiet place in Central Africa, and I'm going back. This job is too difficult, and it is not very satisfactory working a cinematograph when you would rather work a mitrailleuse."

MICHIGAN CLERGYMEN ATTACK PICTURES.

Some Michigan Methodist ministers opposed the idea of a constructive policy in regard to moving pictures at the conference cabinet meeting in Muskegon. The report of the committee ascribed many of the current crimes to the character of the films shown in many theatres. "Instead of a wholesale attack, however," it recommended "we should seek to promote, instead of crime-breeding pictures, a wholesome and educational line of films." When the matter reached the floor of the house there was dissension. Some of the preachers contended it was impossible to regulate the moving picture shows and that the best thing was to advise the people to stay away from them. Bishop Burt, however, did not agree with this policy and pointed out that there were many things which they should do as citizens, if not as ministers, for the betterment of their communities.

pictures it with rare skill; but he becomes fascinated by the subtle charm of treatment—he is, in truth, the very director who should be given a play of admirable structure to handle. He has the imagination to grasp it and to visualize it, but his ideas of structure are not so good. Practically nine out of ten plays suffer from this weakness, and "A Question of Identity" is far from being an exception.

Scene from "A Question of Identity" (Edison).

One has only to consider the popularity of detective stories to realize that a favorite occupation of the human mind is to puzzle out things. A part of a story's entertainment is to rouse curiosity and start people to solving what mystifies, or, at least, to feel a tingling interest in the outcome. To state the problem in the main title is, therefore, rarely advisable, and still less so is the presentment during early scenes of what should be held up until the preparatory explanations are over and all forces gathered for the crisis.

Lady Barrington, long alienated from her husband, makes a death-bed confession to Father Journet, a priest who subsequently becomes a cardinal. She also confides Robert, one of her twin sons, to the priest's care. Robert is apprenticed to a clock-maker and follows the course of Hogarth's bad apprentice. The good twin, Richard, loves Lois Norton. When Robert murders a prominent man, Lois sees him from a window and mistakes him for Richard, the one to whom she is engaged.

There is now a true dramatic situation set up, for an innocent man, Claude de Brissac, is accused and convicted of the crime. The involuntary witness has a secret on her conscience. If she reveals it, she will implicate—so she believes—her fiancee; if she guards it to save him an innocent man will pay the penalty. All other action in the drama is unimportant or merely subsidiary to this condition of mental anguish and Mabel Trunnelle does the best that could be done without the assistance of double exposure to exhibit her state of mind. Her work stands almost alone, and it deserves high praise. Her final decision brings about the tragic death of the bad twin, release of the innocent man and restores confidence in the object of her affections.

While the story has structural shortcomings, it contains one big dramatic situation, and the treatment makes it a delight to the eye, by the treatment of Mr. Brabin and the interpretation of Miss Trunnelle and her support. Next to her performance, that of Carlton King ranks high in effectiveness. He portrays the Cardinal as at once a dignified, scholarly and lovable character.

Senate Chamber as Stage Setting

Cameraman's Subterfuge Gains Him Admission Into Senate —Doubtful Whether Pictures Taken Will Be Produced.

THE filming of staged events in the Senate Chamber at the Capitol has created a terrible stir among some members of that legislative body, who have declared that this action has broken all precedents. It appears that a cameraman approached the sergeant-at-arms of the Senate and it is said told him that he had obtained permission from the vice president to take the pictures. This was later denied by the latter, and when the incident was brought up during the general business of the Senate a controversy arose between Vice President Marshall and Senator Overman, the latter asserting that the former, if he had given permission to take the pictures, had greatly exceeded his authority.

It is said that these Senate scenes were taken just a short time prior to the opening of the regular session. The Vice President was in the chair, and a number of Senators were assembled. The chaplain was present and offered a prayer, as is usual at the commencement of the day's business, and following this the usual routine of the body was filmed. The pages were present and bills were introduced. Pictures of the Senate press gallery were also obtained, as were views of the pages at play, during which two of them were shown engaged in a wrestling match. Douglas Seeley, the smallest of the pages, had his picture taken while in the act of shaking hands with Senator Ollie James, of Kentucky, the biggest member of the Senate.

The pictures were obtained, it was declared, for use in educational work, but in view of the attitude of the Senators it is doubtful if they will ever be produced. It is said the cameraman should have secured the permission of the Rules Committee, which has direct supervision over such matters.

OHIO PICTURE MEN MAY HAVE NEWSPAPER.

Representatives of the Pittsburgh organization of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America who attended the booster meeting of the state branch at Columbus, Ohio, several days ago, are optimistic regarding the prospects for future business and for co-operation on the part of league members. Dr. H. Q. Alexander, secretary-treasurer of the Dayton branch, was chosen a member of a committee of three which is to make arrangements for a state newspaper to be published for the exclusive benefit and use of the motion picture men in Ohio. Harry Vestal, of Columbus, and Mr. Cole, of Cleveland, were also appointed on this committee.

A grievance committee was also named to confer with the censorship board regarding the complaints of exchangemen or exhibitors. Since the Board of Censorship took up its work, about 25,000 films have been passed upon, and only 88 of these were disqualified by the board. Val Rayburg is president of the Dayton branch of the League.

"His Heart, His Hand and His Sword"

Warren Kerrigan, as Terrence O'Rourke, an Irish Soldier of Fortune, Is Hero of a New Serial to Be Released by Victor.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE character of its Irish hero, Terrence O'Rourke, will be the chief point of interest in this new serial, ready for release by the Victor (Universal) Company, and which, we understand, is to be episodical and each issue, two reels in length, self-contained, so that one can enjoy a separate story each week and need not have seen any of the tale that has gone before.

Scene from "His Heart, His Hand and His Sword" (Univ.).

One cannot help feeling that the first episode, which is very slight, did little more than awaken a lively interest in Terrence and a willingness to watch for the next installment for what is going to happen. Most of this first part is utilized in making us acquainted with the hero, a man who has won honors in Mexico, in the Greek War of Independence, and has been decorated with the ribbon of the Legion of Honor for a gallant deed while serving with the French Army in North Africa. He is as the story opens hard up and sells his cherished medal. At the gambling table which reduces him again that same night to absolute poverty he is seen winning with the same bored frown as he wears later when luck is against him. He falls in love with a pretty face in a restaurant. This woman is a princess and may be the heroine of the tale. She excites curiosity by the way she treats her husband, the prince, over whom she seems to hold the whip hand. Perhaps he has done some crime; perhaps she has only hired him to play he is her husband and that they are not married; perhaps he is just some nonentity whom she merely holds under.

The princess has a legal adviser who loves her. This man and Terrence are jealous of each other and fight a card-deck duel, drawing for the fatal ace, which Terrence wins. He is saved by the princess. The two men make up, perhaps because the princess, whom both love, needs the help of Terrence to rescue her brother, a captive of Bedouins. This is all and it is not much; but there is more to follow. It is pretty well staged and acted.

Dr. Wm. Hightower, of Hope, Ark., has opened a moving picture theater in that place with a seating capacity of 400. Universal service is being used, and a Wurlitzer orchestra, costing $1,350, furnishes the music. Business is very satisfactory.

Miss Frances M. Nelson

"MY full name is Frances M. Nelson," she told the interviewer in her dressing-room at the Victor studio, "and I suppose you will want to know what the middle 'M' stands for;" this time she blushed through her grease-paint.

"No, not particularly interested, but then you might tell me," came from the interviewer.

The blush deepened to a rosier hue.

"Well, if you must know" (pause). "It's —am—it stands for Maude," and the clever young woman showed distinct signs of embarrassment.

Imagine it! Miss Nelson isn't a bit in love with her middle name, "Maude." And it's not such a bad name, either.

This charming leading woman has just joined the Victor Company, coming from the Biograph, where she played leads. She is not so very tall, and, yet, not so very small; in fact, she is just about the right size. When she smiles the faintest suspicion of dimples flashes on her cheeks, and she is generally smiling.

Miss Frances M. Nelson.

"I was born in St. Paul, Minn., twenty-two years ago," she said, "and while I was still a wee wisp of a girl, we moved to Boston. I went to school in Boston until the death of my parents four years ago, up to which time I had never seriously considered going on the stage. Circumstances changed, however, with the result that I went on with Lew Field's 'The Wife Hunters,' playing the part of Florence Lang."

Although Miss Nelson refrained from any self-praise, it was evident that she made a success in her first role, for as soon as she closed with "The Wife Hunters," she was offered a good place in a prominent Philadelphia stock company. She played there for five weeks, going later to Indianapolis where she also played in stock. After this came a season in "Ready Money," in which Miss Nelson played the lead in the Western company.

By this time Miss Nelson had made rapid strides toward success on the legitimate, and when Tom Wise formed the company for "The Silver Wedding," she was chosen for a leading role. After this she went with the Biograph Company.

Miss Nelson is also an athletic woman, being an expert swimmer. When she was but a thirteen-year-old slip of a girl she swam eight miles in Boston Harbor, a performance which caused much press comment and for which the girl was highly lauded.

At present Miss Nelson is playing opposite Ben Wilson in "Ambition." It is a picture in which she plays the part of an actress who struggles against a false ambition, and who finally realizes the futility of her misguided combat.

A "KITTY COBB" WINDOW.

Word has just been received from H. E. Stahler, manager of the Dallas, Texas, exchange of Warner's Features, Inc., of a cooperative advertising plan.

Mr. Stahler has booked "The Adventures of Kitty Cobb" extensively in the Dallas territory. During the time that the film is shown there, the big department store of Tiche-Goettinger will have an elaborate window display of James Montgomery Flagg's famous book. The window will be decorated with the beautiful Kitty Cobb lithographs in seven colors and also with photographs. A card will give the names and addresses of the motion picture theaters where this big four-part feature can be seen.

The theaters will co-operate by displaying slides stating that a special sale of the book telling the story of Kitty Cobb in picture and text is being held by the department store.

"Markia"

Clean, Straight Melodrama Full of Thrills and Sensation, Released by the Kinetophote Corporation.

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

THE full title of this five-reel picture, made by the Ambrosio Company, is "Markia, or the Destruction of Carthage, an Incident of the Third Roman Punic War." It is not based on any known incident of history but is a purely sensational melodramatic story in a quasi-historical setting that allows of big thrilling effects, such as turbulent senate meetings, rebellious armies, wholesale massacres, battles both on land and sea, burning palaces and the destruction of a town. It is sure to find a welcome among photoplay fans and will be enthusiastically received, especially by those who have Latin blood in their veins and understand the fine points of Italian nature and acting.

Scene from "Markia" (Kinetophote).

Markia's part is played by the actress who a couple of years ago played the part of Calypso in the Milano Company's "Odyssey of Homer," and will be gladly welcomed by all those who have seen the earlier play. In this picture, she has a much better chance and she has made the most of it, as the daughter of Hasdrubal, Governor of Carthage, who falls in love with the lieutenant of mercenaries who, after escaping the massacre in which Hasdrubal slays the embassy of the dissatisfied troops, carries the rebellious soldiers over to Scipio and the Roman side.

Scene from "Markia" (Kinetophote).

He is afterwards captured by one of the Carthaginian scouting parties, taken into the city and saved from death by Markia, but is later condemned to the galleys at the instigation of Zamah, Markia's stepmother, whose professions of love for him he has rejected. After the capture of Carthage, Markia escapes to the galley in which he is confined and discovers him during the battle with the Roman fleet, which has pursued and overtaken the fleeing Carthaginian vessel. After capturing the vessel the Romans set it on fire and the picture ends with the thrilling escape of Markia and her sweetheart from the doomed galley.

The burning of the galleys to the water's edge is a remarkably fine picture and another scene that calls for special mention is the dawn scene, which shows the sun rising over the Mediterranean sea and dispelling vast masses of fog and clouds.

Bliss Milford

IT is the little town of Hope, North Dakota, which Bliss Milford claims as her bithplace and the scene of her childhood days. While a mere slip of a country lass she was stricken with the stage fever and, with several of her schoolmates, fitted up a theater in an old barn. The tiny tots made their own footlights, painted their own scenery and built their own "props." Miss Milford would write the plays and direct the scenes as well as play the role of leading lady.

Bliss Milford.

However, she always found time to devote to study until, at the age of fifteen, she decided upon a theatrical career. It was in the "County Chairman" that she received a flying start on the road to success. While appearing as ingenue in one of the Stair & Havlin productions, Miss Milford made a wonderful impression upon Elsie Janis, the famous comedienne, who placed her in touch with Charles Dillingham. The management was quick to recognize Miss Milford's genius and had a part written for her in "The Candy Shop." Her excellent performance in this part resulted in the clever actress being starred in "Sentimental starred in the well remembered "Sentimental Sally."

Miss Milford forsook the legitimate stage to join the Edison forces about three years ago, and has never failed to score a tremendous success in every one of the various character parts with which she has been entrusted. As the chorus girl in the "What Happened to Mary" series, she performed an extremely difficult role which required delicate and artistic treatment.

While Miss Milford possesses remarkable versatility, it is needless to say that comedy is her forte, as may be judged from her performances in the "Sherlock Holmes Girl," "The Tango in Tuckerville," "Twins and Trouble," "Two's Company" and "Grand Opera in Rubeville."

Possessed with exceptional intelligence and personal magnetism, Bliss Milford has steadily forged ahead until she is now in the leading ranks in the land of filmdom.

CLARA KIMBALL YOUNG TO APPEAR IN "THE BUTTERFLY."

The World Film Corporation announces that Clara Kimball Young's second feature film is to be based on Henry Kitchll Webster's story of "The Butterfly," which is one of the most popular current works of fiction and which enjoyed great popularity when it appeared as a serial story in The Saturday Evening Post. Clara Kimball Young is just finishing the work on "Lola," the Owen Davis story, which shows her in a field that is uniquely her own, and one in which her admirers will be glad to see her again. Mr. Young also appears in it, as well as Ola Humphreys, the famous dramatic star, who has just returned from a prolonged tour of Australia, where she has appeared as a star. It is planned to have the "Butterfly" released in December.

"The Diamond of Disaster"

Thanhouser Two-Reel a Well Constructed Melodrama Full of Thrills and Indian Splendor.

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

THIS picture, of which Phil Lonergan is the author and Carroll Fleming the director, will undoubtedly meet with a welcome reception wherever it is shown. The theme of the story is not a new one and it has been told several times before both in picture and in story, but there are some new twists to the present production that not only prove an alibi to any charge of plagiarism, but at the same time give it a novel shape and interest. As the picture was made in this country, a few of the scenes lack somewhat of the atmosphere of Hindustan or India in which all of the action takes place, but it is only the hypercritical who will notice them and the compelling interest of the story is bound to carry over the minor defects.

The only real fault to be found with the picture is in the latter half of the story, where there are several leaders in succession all of them reading "Later." This should have been avoided as it gives a disagreeable impression that the story has been chopped and clipped and the incidents badly pieced together. Aside from this and the fact that some of the exteriors might have been better chosen, the picture is a "real good show" and is sure to please.

One exceptionally meritorious thing about the picture is the Englishman's bungalow, which is a real house built in the studio yard in order that it might be blown up by the bandits. The interiors deserve all praise and with the exception that some of the palms were evidently potted plants, the exterior was a most creditable reproduction.

The acting throughout was of a high order and especially noticeable was J. S. Murray as the Hindu merchant, Justus D. Barnes as the bandit, Ernest Ward as the fakir, Morgan Jones as the rajah, John Richards as Hassan, the rajah's captain; Muriel Ostriche as Zelda, the dancing girl; Irving Cummings as the Englishman; Carey L. Hastings as his wife and David Thompson as their servant.

Max Asher

"THE funniest Dutch comedian in pictures," he is called by many of his Los Angeles friends, and admirers throughout the country are almost, if not more enthusiastic about this California boy who has risen to be a top notch laughmaker.

Max Asher was born in Oakland, although he should have seen the light over in Germany. He is a son of the glorious spring, having been born on May 5, and therefore his disposition is extremely sunny, as is seen by his acting. At the age of fourteen the youthful comedian appeared at the People's theater in his home town. Later he did vaudeville work, and for some time was known as "Mysterio," the King of Cards, being a really and truly magician. In later years Mr. Asher has been seen in musical comedy, at one time being stationed in Western Canada, where he amused thousands of people in his eternal Dutch role.

Max Asher.

The screen first saw him in the latter part of 1912, when he appeared in Keystone films. He played here for some time, later going to the Universal, where he now is. Max Asher and Joker Comedies have been so closely linked that when he was transferred across the street to the Sterling plant it came somewhat as a surprise, for Joker comedies were renowned because of Max Asher. One of his best pictures was "The Cheese Special," a roaring comedy put on at a beach amusement resort, the miniature train having been used. Max was seen to good advantage in a big pirate story in which he took the part of the famous Captain Kidd, of treasure fame. His make-up in this production was voted the best ever, and his inimitable expressions won much applause for him. A few days ago he was placed in a scene where he had to be buried. The director, Allen Curtis, always keen for realistic punches, used a real grave and real dirt, and poor Max nearly suffocated when under the weight of the earth. He was pulled out just in time, too, for his wind was getting short. He will be seen hereafter in forthcoming Sterling releases.

HEAVY BOOKING FOR KLEINE FEATURE.

General Film offices report heavy booking for the new Kleine special feature department release, "Judge Not." A prosecuting attorney, subject to spells of temporary aberration, kills his best friend while under the influence of his peculiar malady. He promptly starts a vigorous campaign to find the murderer and ingeniously draws a network of evidence about an innocent party from which it seems impossible to escape. A scientist, attracted by one of the attorney's momentary spells at a dinner party, guesses the facts and gradually solves the mystery. The film is conspicuous for its rapid action and the absorbing way in which the story is told. The opening scene in the first reel shows the murdered man lying on the ground with a group of bystanders about him. The second reel takes the audience back to events occuring a week before the murder. The fourth reel again takes up the thread of the tale and follows it to a close.

KLEINE PICTURE AT BOSTON.

George Kleine's six-part subject, "For Napoleon and France," opened the doors of the Boston Opera House, October 19th. The military aspects of the picture are expected to prove heavy drawing cards at the present time. The odd costumes of Napoleon's soldiers and the old-fashioned armament of the period form striking contrasts to modern war materials. "For Napoleon and France" has a number of stirring battles quite as realistic through the camera's eye as though historic Waterloo had actually been photographed.

New Feature Exchange

Montgomery-Simmons Film Service Opens Business With Some Strong Subjects.

STARTING out with such features as "Markia," the story of the fall of Carthage, "Forgiven," a picturized version of the old drama known also as "The Jack O' Diamonds," and others, the Montgomery-Simmons Film Service, Inc., has begun the booking of feature films in the offices of the Kinetophote Corporation at 126 West 46th street.

Both of the young men whose names make up the title of the corporation are well known to the trade throughout the United States. Each has had a wide experience in the various phases of the film business which make up the process of good booking and the combination is, therefore, a happy one.

George N. Montgomery has been active in the exhibiting end of the trade as well as in the exchange end, having had to do with a broad field of endeavor in the South. He is familiar with the problems of the exchange as well as the exhibitor and is equipped to bring the two branches into harmony with each other.

Ira H. Simmons was formerly booking manager for the World Film Corporation and the Shubert Feature Film Company. His experience has covered every sort of work with films. His acquaintanceship reaches out to every city of any size in the United States. With Mr. Montgomery and Mr. Simmons are Marcus A. Miller, who will be active as vice-president of the company, and Saul G. Lippman, who is manager of the New York Exchange of the organization.

The concern has announced as well that there are eighteen big features reposing in the vaults at 126 West Forty-sixth street which will be put out as fast as the exchanges of the Montgomery-Simmons service can handle them. Later "The Span of Life," with Lionel Barrymore in the star role and supported by Maude Wynne, which the Kinetophote Corporation's company is now filming, will be on the market. This picture will be interesting from the fact that the scenario has been written by Catherine Carr from Sutton Vane's famous drama of that name.

"POP" LUBIN VISITS WORLD OFFICE.

There was brief altercation in the ante-room of the office of the Moving Picture World last Tuesday noon and then the office boy, who is supposed to announce visitors, came hurriedly into the editorial rooms closely pursued by the tall figure of a man who proved to be "Pop" Lubin.

"That boy," said "Pop," indicating about four feet of alertness, "wanted to know who I was, who I wanted to see and what my business was. I told him I didn't know and came right in anyway; glad to see you. My, how this paper is growing."

When the proper greeting had been accorded to our smiling visitor, for "Pop" always has a smile for his friends, he proceeded to entertain the staff with as fine a comedy monologue as is ever heard either on or off a vaudeville stage. It was a running comment on the business in general with occasional references to the Lubin Manufacturing Company in particular, and elicited several spasms of laughter by the many quaint and truly Lubinesque remarks.

Regarding Betzwood and the splendid motion picture plant he has built there, Mr. Lubin was quite enthusiastic. "I also have a farm at Betzwood; such a farm," he said. "The head guy told me the other day 'there is fifty new chickens and fifty new eggs, a new lamb and some new pigs and—a horse has died.' Ach, there goes all the profits! I ask him 'what is de matter with de horse.' He said 'it fell and broke its neck, and the doctor said 'the only way to save it was to kill it'; what's the use."

"But think of all the nice fresh eggs you can have for breakfast, Mr. Lubin," we ventured to remind him.

"Ach, they cost me five dollars apiece; I buy them cheaper, but its a fine farm," he concluded.

After a few more compliments upon the fine appearance of the Moving Picture World "Pop" said goodbye and went to keep another engagement.

FRANK C. BANGS BREAKS HIS ARM.

While working in the dark room of the Bangs Laboratories on 90th street, New York, Frank C. Bangs fell through a trap door which had been left open and sustained a serious fracture of his upper right arm on Thursday, October 8. An operation was required to remove splintered bone from the arm and Mr. Bangs is at the hospital doing as well as could be expected under the circumstances.

Miss Sterne Wins Again

Successful Vitagraph-Evening Sun Contestant Now Second in Telegraph Competition—McCardell First.

ELAINE STERNE, winner of the first prize of $1,000 in the recent Vitagraph-Evening Sun scenario contest, has been declared the second in a close finish in the Morning Telegraph-Chartered Theaters Corporation comedy scenario prize contest. Roy McCardell is the winner of first honors. Here is the formal decision of the judges, the prizes being $1,000, $500 and $250, respectively:

First Prize—Roy L. McCardell of New Rochelle, N. Y., for three-reel comedy, entitled "A Jay in Peacock Alley." Second Prize—Miss Elaine Sterne of New York City, for three-reel comedy, entitled "Without Hope." Third Prize—Miss Caroline Benbrooke Wells of St. Louis, Mo., for three-reel comedy, entitled "'A Puritan's Conscience."

The contest was inaugurated on June 15 and closed September 15 of this year. During the three months 3,654 manuscripts were received. But 511 of this number stood the test of the first reading. From the remainder it is probable that fifty high-class motion picture comedies will be retained as worthy of production.

The judges found great difficulty in deciding which of the three was the better one. Each tells in a distinctive way a distinctive story, and in plot and situations all were equally strong. The availability of each for picturization had then to be decided. Each point to be considered in deciding the values of the competitive scenarios was given a certain percentage, those nearest to 100 being considered the best. It is interesting to note that Mr. McCardell's comedy received 98 per cent. as against Miss Sterne's 97 per cent. and Miss Wells's 96 per cent.

WORLD FILMS AT WILLIS THEATER.

The World Film Corporation has landed one of the coveted contracts of the season in signing up the New Willis Wood Theater, in Kansas City, for a fifty-two weeks' contract by which the management of that house is to have the first run on all the Shubert and Brady features in Kansas City. The Willis Wood Theatre was for years the first class play house of Kansas City.

Gladys Wynne

GLADYS WYNNE has been engaged by the Kinetophote Corporation for the part of Kate Heathcote in "The Span of Life," which is now being put on in the company's studio at Coney Island, with Lionel Barrymore in the leading male role. Miss Wynne has never appeared in pictures before and is in reality the product of the drama, having been with George Arliss in "Disraeli," as well as in many other successes.

Gladys Wynne.

"The Span of Life" has been picturized by Catherine Carr from the famous old drama of the same name by Sutton Vane from whose estate the Kinetophote Corporation purchased the World's rights. The locations for the picture have been chosen with care, the country homes of several prominent New Yorkers being used in the outdoor scenes. The interiors, under Edward Mackay's direction, are staged to conform with Mr. Vane's ideas.

When ready for release, this picture will be booked through the Montgomery-Simmons Film Service, Inc., which has offices in the Kinetophote establishment at 126 West Forty-sixth Street.

NARROW ESCAPE FOR TWO SCREENERS.

Jacob H. Gerhardt, treasurer of the Screen Club, and Moe Streimer, a fellow-member, narrowly escaped serious injury Monday night when a taxicab in which they were riding collided with a pillar of the elevated railroad structure. Mr. Gerhardt was cut by glass and suffered a sprained arm. Mr. Streimer was shaken up and bruised.

Among the Picture Theaters

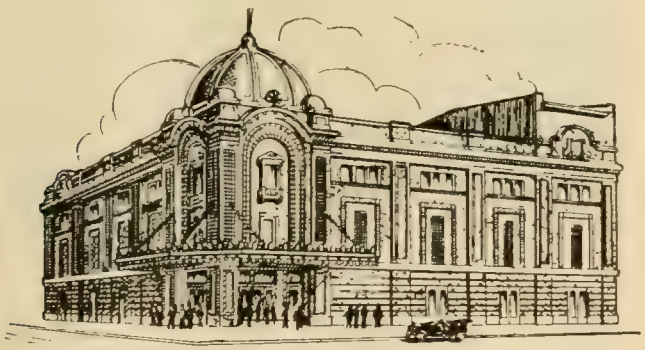
BIG CINCINNATI HOUSE.

Casino Theater Company's New Picture Emporium A Splendid Structure—Wurlitzer Organ Among Features.

A FEW years ago a hole in the wall or a store rudely converted into a moving picture auditorium served as a suitable place for the presentation of moving pictures. Intelligent men with a prescience not altogether inexplicable by reason of the fact that a fair amount of profit was being made from these makeshift picture houses observed that considerably greater earnings could be secured by the showing of moving pictures in a theater ostensibly constructed for the purpose. Consequently several really good picture theaters were built, and this led to the erection of others even better in construction and architecture than the earlier ones. The building of the moving picture theater has now developed into a science, and those who are not inclined to take cognizance of this progress are being left behind. It does seem paradoxical to say that even though there is not a thing to be desired in the really high class picture houses there will always be improvements made.

James H. Dryden.

For the benefit of our readers and for the information of posterity we have been recording in the pages of the Moving Picture World by illustration and by story the opening and erection of big picture theaters. Therefore it is with the same amount of pleasure that we give space to the excellent picture house in course of erection in Cincinnati by William & Edward Corcoran, who comprise the Casino Theater Company. The name of the newcomer is the Casino, and it will be under the management of James H. Dryden, who was formerly connected with the Hippodrome. From the accompanying architect's line drawing it will be seen that the building is of a massive order, beautiful in design and architecture. It is one of the largest moving picture theaters in Cincinnati and when completed will cost over $125,000. The location of the Casino is at the corner of Clark and Linn streets. There are 900 seats on the parquet floor and 600 in the balcony, making a total seating capacity of 1,500. It is built of fireproof material and contains all the conveniences desired by the most fastidious.



Architect's Drawing of Casino Theater, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Of the many features the big Wurlitzer motion picture orchestra probably stands pre-eminent. This instrument is of the H. & K. style and contains every conceivable combination of instruments and effects, according to the Wurlitzer Company. It is 5 feet 2 inches in height with a depth of 3 feet 3 inches. It is 15 feet 4 inches in width.

ORPHEUM THEATER, FOND DU LAC, WIS.

THE Orpheum Theater, Fond Du Lac, Wis., which was formerly known as the Royal, has recently undergone a number of improvements, and has come out in its new dress as one of the most beautiful picture houses in Fond Du Lac. According to the managers, Messrs. Prinsen & Martin, it is the oldest picture theater in that city, and during the week of August 17 they celebrated the seventh anniversary of their business.

Probably the most noticeable improvement is the lowering of the floor to the street level. The entire floor now slants directly from the entrance way to the stage, making exit from the house far more rapid. The seats are arranged in sections with two separating aisles. The interior and exterior have been completed in stucco work. The walls are decorated in light green and French gray with stucco decorations in ivory. Suspended from the walls are crystal lights dropped from bronze ornaments which also support oscillating electric fans. An indirect lighting system is used exclusively. Six large bowl chandeliers containing three lamps of 120 candle-power each supply the illumination.

Orpheum Theater, Fond du Lac, Wis.

Conduits carry all electric wires in the structure, making exposed connections impossible. All of the electrical work has been done under the supervision of City Electrician John E. O'Brien. The operating room is lined with fireproof asbestos board and metal. Fireproof automatic shutters make the room air-tight in case of the burning of a film.

Marble forms the background of the decorations of the lobby, the ticket office and lower walls being entirely of this material, while the stucco work in ornamental designs forms the upper part. Tile is used for the floor material.

The auditorium has a seating capacity of 400, and the ceiling is fourteen feet high in the rear and twenty feet in the front. There is a Powers' 6a motor-driven machine.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"THE GOLDEN HOPE (Lubin).

This is the sixth number of the Beloved Adventurer series now being released by the Lubin Company, one each Monday. Again Lord Cecil is penniless and at his wits' end to satisfy his creditors and save the old ancestral home from the money sharks. He returns to America in a desperate attempt to battle with Dame Fortune. There he suffers hardships and even offers the stock of the Golden Hope mine to the landlords of the poor hotel where he lives, to satisfy his bill and to be permitted to stay on for a few more weeks. The landlord laughs at the offer and Cecil is very hard pressed. When it is noised about that a new gold field has been struck and the Golden Hope is the richest claim, worth at least a million. The swindler sets to work and endeavors to secure the stock back, but the little Western girl discovers the true situation and comes to the rescue of the confiding Englishman. Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe are very charming in this number and do credit to Emmett Campbell Hall's excellent story.

THE EXPLORER (Balboa).

Dr. Frederick A. Cook, discoverer of the North Pole, world-renowned explorer, Chautauqua lecturer and chief of the expedition which scaled the summit of Mt. McKinley, is preparing, together with the Balboa Amusement Producing Company of Long Beach, California, to make a six-reel feature photodrama, "The Explorer," in which Dr. Cook will be the star character. The scenario—written especially for the big production by the Balboa Company's photoplay editor, Frank W. Wiltermood—contains scores of highly interesting scenes in substantiation of Dr. Cook's claims that he reached the northern boreal center on April 21, 1908, and thus outstripped Robert E. Peary.

Many of the most important scenes will be enacted on the snowclad peaks of the San Bernardino mountains, 80 miles from Los Angeles, the entire company of players to make the trip in a fleet of autos, Genuine Eskimo dogs, igloo houses, sledges and other Arctic property will be used to make the films realistic. A charming romance, in which Dr. Cook's prowess as an explorer wins him a wealthy bride, forms the basis of the scenario.

In Dr. Cook's book, "My Attainment of the Pole," are many camera snapshots he obtained during his famous boreal dash, and these pictures will be reproduced in motofoto views designed to delight and instruct millions of cinema theater patrons throughout the world. The ascent of Mt. McKinley by Dr. Cook will be portrayed dramatically, along with scenes depicting his work as surgeon with the Belgian South Pole Expedition in 1897, in charge of Commander de Gerlache.

MOTION PICTURES OF CAPITOL FOR EXPOSITION.

Moving pictures of Washington, D. C., will be among the features of the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco, and plans to give visitors an opportunity of viewing the activities of the Government in Washington, by means of motion picture films, have just been completed by the Government Exhibit Board, of which Adolph C. Miller, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, is the chairman. J. C. Boykin, his assistant, has been directing operations from his office in the Interior Department, but he will move within the next few months to San Francisco to direct the exhibits.

In the motion picture exhibit there will be shown a series of pictures of the familiar places in and around Washington, including historic Mount Vernon, the home of President Washington; Arlington Cemetery, where members of the army and navy are buried; Fort Myer, Va., a cavalry and artillery army post; the Washington Monument and the public buildings, the Cabinet officers, members of Congress in action, and many other views.

Cameramen have been sent on a revenue cutter to Alaska, where will be taken pictures showing life in that part of our domain. There will be reels showing reclamation projects, forest fires, and means of fire prevention; the Indian schools, the arrival of immigrants at Ellis Island; the Panama Canal as it appeared in 1911 and again in 1913, showing the progress made in the cutting of the big ditch, and motion pictures will be utilized to depict many other of the Government's activities that should prove of marked interest to the visitor. These reels will be shown in three lecture rooms, and will be the subject of a continuous exhibition daily.

"WHAT'S HIS NAME" (Lasky).

The postponed release of the Lasky production of George Barr McCutcheon's picturized book, "What's His Name" will occur on the Paramount program, November 22, when Max Figman, whose work in "The Man on the Box" suggested his further engagement to the Lasky Company, will be seen in a role exceptionally to his liking.

Mr. Figman plays the part of the husband of a prominent actress who is "interned" at Tarrytown in a home for which the actress is paying. He is being "kept out of the way" by her, at the suggestion of a Mr. Fairfax, millionaire and man-about-town, who is fascinated by "What's His Name's" wife.

Director General Cecil De Mille considers "What's His Name" the most compelling story Lasky has yet filmed. Its heart interest is direct and the story is one that should strike a responsive chord in all classes. Following "What's His Name" "Ready Money" will be released by the Lasky firm.

"A FACTORY MAGDALEN" (Sawyer).

Elwood F. Bostwick has been spending a busy three weeks in Stillwater, Rhode Island, directing the Edyth Totten feature, "A Factory Magdalen," which will soon be marketed by Sawyer, Inc. It was originally intended to make this a four-reeler, but it has been found that it is impossible to condense the action into a film of that length, so it will be in five. The company, headed by Miss Totten, has been very fortunate indeed, and from the four thousand feet so far exhibited in the Pompeiian Projecting Room, there is every reason to believe that the picture will be a great success.

Scene from "The Factory Magdalen" (Sawyer).

The actor second in importance to Miss Totten is four legged and his name is "Rex." The brilliant performance of this canine genius was due to long police department training, and during the course of the swiftly moving events visualized, he traces and captures the murderer and three thieves, rescues Miss Totten from a whirling millstream, and does lots of other stunts that makes his owner a proud man. The Providence Sunday Journal recently devoted a full page and a half to a story dealing with the making of the picture.

WURLITZER ISSUES FINE CATALOG.

The forty-eight page catalog of automatic musical instruments issued by the Rudolph Wurlitzer Company of Cincinnati, Ohio, is a handsomely illustrated piece of sales literature which will interest the exhibitor who contemplates installing a self-playing orchestra. The catalog illustrates, in actual colors, various styles of automatic harps, electric pianos, with and without mandolin attachments, flute and violin pipes, drum and triangle accompaniments; also orchestras and violin pianos.

In addition, several types of military bands are shown, as well as an ingenious control mechanism, by which a nickel may be dropped into a receiving box and the instument started from any part of the hall which may be desired. The information regarding instrumentation, dimensions and shipping weight of each style is very complete in detail and the catalog will prove a very helpful aid in the selection of something suitable for any house, from the most modest to the most pretentious.

R. HENDERSON BLAND GOES ON THE STAGE.

R. Henderson Bland, the English actor who became known to picture followers through his reverential portrayal of the character of Christ in Kalem's "From the Manger to the Cross," has gone on tour with William Elliott's "Kitty Mackay" company. Mr. Bland is playing the part of Lord Inglehart. He admits that his interest in his stage work is diminished by reason of the conflict now raging in Europe. Mr. Bland has two brothers in active service—one is now in hospital in England, having been wounded—and a third on the way with a battalion from South Africa. While in New York this week Mr. Bland visited the offices of the British consul for the purpose of offering his services.

SCREEN CLUB MEETS ON OCTOBER 30.

The annual meeting of the Screen Club takes place on the evening of October 30, at which time the officers for the coming year will be duly installed.

WILLIAM EPSTEIN.

A NEW theater to cost $1,000,000, for the presentation of motion pictures de luxe is now in the hands of architects and construction will shortly be begun on San Antonio's busiest street. William Epstein, owner of the Royal Theater, the 2,500-seat house in San Antonio, is the man who believes in million-dollar theaters.

William Epstein.

The new temple of pictures will have a seating capacity of 4,500. Under the same roof will also be a magnificent ballroom, bowling alleys and billiard rooms.

The Royal Theater now houses exclusively the Paramount Program in San Antonio. To this amusement enterprise Mr. Epstein has devoted the major portion of his time since he sold out his interests in the Southern Feature Program Association of which he was the organizer.

Mr. Epstein has just returned to Texas after a two weeks' stay in New York. While here he purchased a thousand-dollar fountain of the same variety that adorns the Strand Theater in New York, also a huge electric sign.

Mr. Epstein still has his eyes open for the main chance in feature film renting and while in Manhattan purchased the rights on "The Black Triangle" for the states of Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas and Oklahoma. It is probable that he will also buy the rights on the second release of the Webb Detective Series, "The Man in the Cellar."

CINEMA EXHIBITORS CLUB WILL DANCE.

It is announced that the annual entertainment and ball of the Cinema Exhibitors Club of the Bronx, New York, will be held at Hunts Point Palace, 163d Street and Southern Boulevard, on the evening of October 31. Tom Moore of the Kalem Company, and Mary Fuller of the Universal will lead the grand march.

GOEBEL VISITS HIS CALIFORNIA STUDIO.

O. E. Goebel, president of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, St. Louis, Mo., is in Santa Paula, Cal., visiting the studio of his company.

"Big A Features, Ltd.," a company registered in London last year, has been dissolved in bankruptcy, with liabilities of nearly $15,000 and practically no assets. A. Goldgraber was the principal director, and the company appears to have had extensive transactions in America.

AN AEROPLANE ACCIDENT PICTURED.

"MICHAEL STROGOFF" (Alco).

Big and constant appeal to the eye of the spectator is made by the third Alco release, "Michael Strogoff," produced by the Popular Plays and Players Company, with the noted tragedian Jacob P. Adler in the title role. "Michael Strogoff," which is in five reels with 249 scenes, has many exciting war scenes in which there is a strong mob element. The burning of Moscow, the escape of refugees down the river of fire on a raft, and the apparent blinding of Strogoff, the messenger of the Czar, are a few of the thrilling incidents of this drama of the War of the Tartars. The drama of Russia is released on October 19.

Scene from "Michael Strogoff" (Alco).

In temperament and in feeling as well as in knowledge of life in Russia and because of his standing as an actor, Mr. Adler is ideally fitted for the part of Michael Strogoff. The pathetic scene in which Strogoff is obliged for a moment to deny his own mother is splendidly acted by Mr. Adler, and in the other scenes he is equally effective.

As usual the Popular Plays and Players Company has given a most effective setting. It is true to Russia and is spectacular to a degree seldom seen on the screen.

"HER MOTHER WAS A LADY" (Lubin).

Shannon Fife, the unassuming college boy writer of the Lubin staff, has told a dainty little story which again makes Cupid a hero and past-master of his art. A young business man, whose mother is socially ambitious and trying to wish him onto a society bud, falls in love with a little Irish girl, who tends table at a railway lunch house. The boy finds it hard to oppose his mother, but love wins out and it proves to be much the best to all parties. The denouement is quite dramatic, but eminently satisfactory and will please all true "lovers" who see the clever picture. John Ince has given the play an excellent cast and himself takes a part that will be remembered by the fans.

Unique Comedies

The Historical Feature Film Co. of Chicago Will Make Regular Weekly Releases of Humorous Subjects.

THE Historical Feature Film Co. of Chicago is now announcing weekly releases. The company acquired some time ago the former plant of George Melies, located in Chicago, and installed considerable new machinery and equipment. Dudley A. Tyng, the well-known La Salle Street broker, is president of the new concern, and Jack J. Lodge, formerly associated with George Melies and Lincoln J. Carter, is general director and in personal charge of the productions.

The Western representative of the Moving Picture World, invited by Mr. Tyng, privately viewed two of the company's current releases. The first of these subjects was a very comical baseball cartoon entitled: "Joe Boko's Adventures in the Big League," drawn by the famous cartoonist, Carlson, formerly with the Chicago Interocean.

We have seen many cartoon pictures, including "Mut and Jeff," in Pathe's Weekly, and while some of them have been rather amusing, very few possessed any real merit. It was rather tiresome, besides, to watch the drawing and writing of each character. These Carlson cartoons of Joe Boko's adventures in baseball are not only extremely funny, but the technical work is the most remarkable I ever saw. Each character is drawn and you see the hand of the artist make the figure by lines and dots. The cast of the play is in this way introduced to you. But then if you please, these figures come to life and move around without the guiding hand, and do the most remarkable stunts in the most illusory manner.

Of course, I have seen that done before and a moving cartoon figure is no novelty, but what I never saw, until seeing this picture, is the perfect smoothness of motion, with hardly a jerk in a figure. As a rule these cartoon players will jump around like marionettes. This has been overcome by Mr. Carlson as near as it is possible, and a mighty tedious and painstaking job it must have been.

Take, for instance, the grandstand in this baseball picture and you can actually see the crowd waving and clapping their hands. Mr. Tyng told me that they will release the World's Baseball Series of 1914 in cartoons with the actual players, and that this picture will be even better than the one I viewed.

The second subject on exhibit did not please me so well. However, it was quite comical and also rather a novelty, the players being all colored people. The leading parts were taken by Bert Murphy, Frank Montgomery and Florence McClain—all three well-known negro actors in vaudeville.

The picture was of the slap-stick variety, dropping a piano on somebody's back and so on, and very funny in parts. It was, however, dragged out too long and not enough action for a 1,000 feet. I would also suggest to take the pictures at a closer range and to make capital of the funny pantomime play of our colored brethren. Nothing is funnier than the natural facial expression of a negro when in distress, surprise or joy. But this must not be overdone. It is not necessary to make a monkey face to register joy or gloom either on the stage or in the pictures. As far as that goes, this negro comedy of the Historical Feature Film Co. is every bit as good as some of these so-called slap-stick horse plays "wished upon us" for the present time by some other manufacturers. What I am trying to get at is this: that the Historical Feature Film Co. has, according to my opinion, not made the most of a really good opportunity. Some very funny things could be produced by negro comedians—rip roaring farces that would not only appeal to the negro patrons of white theaters, but as well to all of us.

The photography in both of these subjects was entirely satisfactory.

TREBLE-CLEF SONG PICTURES AT HAMMERSTEIN'S.

"The Fatherland, the Motherland—the Land of My Best Girl," which is the title of the first Treble-Clef song production, played all week at Hammerstein's Victoria Theater, 42d Street and Seventh Avenue, New York, during the week of October 12. This feature made such a big hit with the old-timers who patronize Hammerstein's that the management of that house contracted for the Treble-Clef service for the remainder of the season. Two new song hits will be released every week commencing November 1. These productions are being directed by William Robert Daly, formerly director for the Universal. The reliability of the Treble-Clef Company is vouched for by the fact that Henry Waterson, of the firm of Waterson, Berlin & Snyder, America's biggest song publishers, is president of the company, and Louis Bernstein, of the Shapiro-Bernstein Company, and president of the Music Publishers' Board of Trade, is treasurer.

Edward Warren

AMONG the exceptionally capable motion picture directors may safely be numbered Edward Warren, who was for a long time, general director for the Solax Company at Flushing, N. Y., and Fort Lee, N. J., and later with the Universal as producer of Victor brand subjects. It was as director for the Solax Company that Mr. Warren first came to prominent notice in the picture field. He took charge of the studio at Flushing almost at the beginning and continued to direct the work of production for more than two years. During that period he produced such pictures as "The Beasts of the Jungle," "The Equine Spy," "The Sewer," "Brennon of the Moor" and "Kelly of the Emerald Isle," all feature subjects, together with many single-reel pictures of note.

Edward Warren.

While with the Universal he made the following feature subjects: "Enmeshed by Fate," "Daughter of a Crook," "A Million in Pearls" and the "Beggar Prince of India" and many single reels.

Propably the most pretentious work done by Mr. Warren was as a free lance. One subject in particular, "The Making of a Scout," an eight-part feature dealing with the American Boy Scout movement. A very complimentary review of this picture was printed in the Moving Picture World at the time it was released and the public press gave it most favorable mention wherever it was shown. Over four hundred complimentary letters from distinguished persons all over the United States were received by the producers. President Wilson accorded it high praise and personal letters were written to Mr. Warren by Theodore Roosevelt, Gifford Pinchot, Judge Ben Lindsey and George D. Pratt.

Mr. Warren is at liberty at present and can be addressed at his home, 13 West 82d Street, New York City.

The Life Photo Film Corporation has bought out the High Grade Feature Film Company, taking over their lease and all of their properties. The offices of the High Grade concern adjoin the present offices of the Life Photo Film Corporation.

Included in the sale is the projection room which will be redecorated and refitted by the Life Photo concern and devoted to projection for the trade.

Messrs. Bauman & Co. have been engaged to redecorate the new offices, particularly the projection room, which will be lined with velvet, and every convenience inaugurated bending toward perfect projection and comfort. In addition, the suite of the Life Photo Film Corporation now gives them the entire 42d street front of the Candler building.

The progress made by the Life Photo Film Corporation since its first release, "The Banker's Daughter," which was succeeded by "The Greyhound," "Northern Lights," "Captain Swift" and "The Ordeal," has been so rapid as to necessitate these enlarged quarters.

The present offices of the company will be devoted to the private rooms for Bernard Loewenthal, the treasurer; Edward M. Roskam, the president, and Jesse J. Goldberg, the secretary. The additional offices will be devoted to the auditors, booking and display departments.

WARNER'S MANAGERS MEET IN BUFFALO.

P. A. Powers, President of Warner's Features, Inc., and O. S. Goan, treasurer and sales manager of the company, met the heads of Warner's exchanges in convention at Buffalo last Saturday. The most important subject considered was Warner's new feature and comedy service, and the enthusiasm displayed over this enterprise was unanimous.

CONFERRING ON "ZUDORA."

Harold MacGrath, the "Sage of Syracuse" and novelizer of "The Million-Dollar Mystery," arrived at the New Rochelle studio of the Thanhouser Film Corporation Thursday for a conference on "Zudora," the new serial which follows the "Mystery." Dr. Daniel Carson Goodman is the creator of this new wonder photoplay. He detailed to Mr. MacGrath some of the early action, and the famous author expressed his satisfaction at being selected to write the novelization of the Goodman serial.

Dr. Goodman and Harold McGrath.

Mr. MacGrath inspected some of the marvelous sets used in the first episode of Zudora and renewed acquaintance with Marguerite Snow, who will play Zudora, and James Cruze, the Hassam Ali, in the new production. Mr. MacGrath first met Miss Snow and Mr. Cruze when "The Million-Dollar Mystery" was launched. "I expect great things from this new production," said Mr. MacGrath. "It is a new construction in photoplay writing and therefore unique. There is a real definite dramatic tenseness. I shall enjoy writing the novelization."

REAL CIRCUS IN "THE CABBAGE PATCH."

When the film version of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" is released by the California Motion Picture Corporation, the patrons of the pictures will have an opportunity to see how elaborately a first-class company of this kind works to produce realistic effects. For the circus scene in the play is the genuine article.

No makeshifts would do, no second-rate performance would satisfy the stage-manager. He had to depict a circus; so he made a circus. He hired a small army of professionals, former stars of the sawdust ring. He erected a big tent at the company's outdoor studio near San Rafael. He advertised his show free to all who might care to see a circus for nothing, and at the same time, see how a big moving picture reel was filmed.

The day of the novel circus found the tent packed. The crowd of willing "supers" enjoyed the treat and relished not a little the chance to be photographed for the "movies."

La Savillas, a crack tumbling troupe, performed on one stage, while the Bensings did bareback riding in an adjoining ring, and, up overhead, the Three Benos did terrifying marvels in an aerial web of trapezes and swings. Komic Kemp, an educated horse whose comedy act has convulsed hundreds of thousands, romped around the big ring, and La Belle Carmen, former Barnum & Bailey's feature wire-rope walker and dancer, performed one of her most famous acts.

It was a wild, merry circus picture, and the reel is so good that it will undoubtedly prove one of the chief attractions in the screened production of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch."

"ENGLAND EXPECTS——" NOT A HEPWORTH.

Through one of those lamentable errors that are unexplainable in any other way than by the momentary failure of the human equation to function accurately at times. The World said, in the last issue by a caption for an engraving, that "England Expects——" was a Hepworth. The story of the picture plainly stated its origin and placed it with the releases of the Cosmofotofilm Company, but the erroneous caption might be misleading, hence this correction.

Hunter Bennett Leaves World Film

HUNTER BENNETT, assistant general manager of the World Film Corporation, has resigned his position with that company. He leaves with the best wishes of the branch office organization, which has been developed to a high degree of efficiency under his guidance, and also the best wishes of General Manager Lewis J. Selznick. At the time he sent in his resignation Mr. Bennett had made himself very well known to every exhibitor throughout the country and his development as an executive of the World Film Corporation has been coincident with the growth of that progressive organization.

Hunter Bennett.

Mr. Bennett has not disclosed his plans for the future, but no doubt, on account of his thorough knowledge of the feature film situation, his services will be in great demand. He has just finished a three months' trip covering the twenty-four branch offices of his company, and during the progress of this trip from continual consultation with exhibitors and exchange men in every section of the United States, has gained a very practical and valuable knowledge of the future of the feature film.

Mr. Bennett came to the World Film Corporation in October, 1913, and passed through the various stages until he reached the position of assistant general manager seven months ago. He has several propositions under consideration and expects to make an early connection.

MARY PICKFORD IN "BEHIND THE SCENES."

The next "Little Mary" production of the Famous Players to be released by the Paramount Program will be "Behind the Scenes," a five-part feature. This is a fascinating play that contrasts the drama of life with the glamor of the footlights. Mary Pickford gives a pathetic charm and winsome grace to the dainty little actress who is the heroine of the story. As Dolly Lane, Mary Pickford stirs the pulse and grips the heart, and gives one of the best screen performances of her career. James Kirkwood plays opposite Mary, in the role of the man who proves that the tawdry glitter of the stage is but base alloy compared with the gold of love.

In the cast also appear such well-known names as Lowell Sherman, Ida Waterman and Russell Bassett. October 26 is the release date.

TO SELECT PICTURES FOR THEATER CHAIN.

The Leading Photoplay Exhibitors, Inc., has opened offices in the World Tower Building, in West Fortieth street. As the title indicates, the company represents an organization of motion picture exhibitors. It is the intention to form a chain of fifty theaters, the pictures to be exhibited in these being selected by the company. The officers, all of whom are exhibitors, are: President, Lee A. Ochs; first vice-president, William Hilkemeier; second vice-president, Aaron A. Corn; secretary, M. L. Fleischman; treasurer, L. F. Blumenthal.

STATE LEAGUE OPENS BOOKING OFFICE.

The booking office of the Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania was opened on October 12 at 1327 Vine street, Philadelphia. Oscar Libros, a man of wide experience in this line, will be in charge of the booking department. He was formerly connected with the Picture Playhouse Film Company and the National Feature Film Company.

"WHATSOEVER A WOMAN SOWETH."

The story of a blighted romance that eventually brings happiness, is told in "Whatsoever a Woman Soweth," a new two-act Essanay drama to be released October 30. The setting is of the days following the Civil War and the play is replete with beautiful costumes and scenery.

The opening of the play finds Pauline Marlowe and Robert Caldwell setting their wedding day. Then Robert's father is found to be an embezzler, and it is a great question in Pauline's mind whether she shall marry Robert, despite the fact that his name is blackened, or whether she should face the comments of the unsympathetic public. She decides to turn from him, and afterwards marries, only to find that her married life is unhappy, that she loves only Robert. He has gone away, struggled and fought alone, and at last returned to his home to take the position as president of the very bank which his father had robbed. Meanwhile Pauline's husband has died, and her interests are centered alone in her son Arthur, who, like his father, has been a great disappointment. When a young man of twenty-three they return home together. He is put to work in a law office where he proves a failure. He talks back to Pauline's father, who is overcome and dies of heart failure. Up to this time Robert Caldwell has avoided her, but now in her sorrow he goes to her and arranges for Arthur to take a position in his bank. Time passes, and Arthur is tempted and falls. Not until he meets the one girl in the world, does he realize what he has done. Robert learns of his dishonesty and feels it his duty to tell Pauline. He does so, and she realizing that she is reaping as she sowed, demands that he pay the penalty. Robert pleads with her to forgive her son and promises not to prosecute him. Anita, Arthur's sweetheart, remains true to him through all his trouble, and Pauline only wishes that she had been as broad-minded in her younger days. Realizing the great generosity of Robert, and the big mistake she has made, she goes to the man whose love she has denied herself of for so many years, and he accepts her with open arms.

ROBERT WARWICK SIGNS WITH WORLD FILM.

Contracts have just been signed by Robert Warwick, who has made a most successful entry into the screen world in the photoplays, "Dollar Mark" and "The Man of the Hour," for further appearances before the camera. This contract calls for Mr. Warwick's exclusive services before the screen for the next two years, and General Manager Selznick, of the World Film Corporation, has agreed to pay Mr. Warwick the largest salary ever paid to a stage star for his spare time. Mr. Warwick's playing before the screen will not conflict with his appearances on the stage. Both are to go on at the same time. This will mean that Mr. Warwick will continue as leading man for Francis Starr, under the direction of David Belasco, and devote his sunlight hours, when not at matinees, to making feature films for the World Film Corporation.

Notes of the Trade

A STRIKING example of the expense entailed in the production of present-day photoplays is to be found in "The Mills of the Gods," a new Ince feature recently made at the Inceville studios of the New York Motion Picture Corporation at Santa Monica, Cal. The story is built about the life of an old Dutch miser and its scenes are laid in Holland.

Carl Gregory, expert cameraman of the Thanhouser forces, in one scene of "Zudora" handled over the same piece of film thirty-nine times in obtaining a double exposure.

Sawyer, Inc., have closed with the Colossus Feature Film Company of 110 West 40th street to handle their New York exchange "zone" office. The Colossus people immediately took over the bookings already made, as well as most of the sales force used in Greater New York by Sawyer, Inc.

* * *

Henry Otto has started out in his new connection with a dramatic theme, "When the Roads Part," for the Beauty Corporation, the story of two young thieves, their attempted robbery and discovery, the awakening of the girl's better self, her decision that their roads must part, and her final happiness. The story is delightfully reminiscent of "In the Bishop's Carriage." Miss Greenwood and Mr. Field are Laura and Joe, the pals, and Mr. Coxen the doctor.

Eugene Pallette is featured in his role of a crook in "A Woman Scorned," a two-reel Reliance-Mutual feature produced by Jack Adolfi at the Mutual studios in Los Angeles.

An immense circus tent with all its attendant factors is among the novel scenes that are incorporated into Thomas H. Ince's new and gripping story of bigotry, "The Hateful God," a recent production at Inceville under the direction of Scott Sidney. Beasts, clowns, acrobats and freaks are united in making the picture one of absolute realism.

The Universal Animated Weekly visualized a full set of life views of the ball players, both the Boston Nationals and the Philadelphia Americans, who clashed in the fight for the world's championsip. These pictures are to be looked forward to with happy anticipation as they are wonderfully lifelike.

The trials and tribulations of the photoplay actor and actress have appeared in print often, but seldom has much been said of the man behind the camera. David C. Santerelli, cameraman for the Edwin August Eaco Films, has met with some thrilling experiences during the filming of photoplays. This particular episode happened while Mr. August was hunting a location in a forest. Fire was discovered and August commanded that Santerelli photograph it. The heat was so intense that the paint on the camera and tripod commenced to peel. The cameraman stuck to his post until the flames were on top of him.

Walter Edwin, director (Universal), is producing a new two-reel drama, "The Price of Redemption." This is a story written and acted by Mary Fuller, with a plot which is a new one, absolutely realistic and true to life.

The Vitagraph Company has received word from London that Kenneth Casey, the Vitagraph boy, will return to this country for the holidays. He has just closed a tour around the world. The last appearances of his trip were in South Africa, where he added many laurels to his wreath of successes.

Carroll Fleming is at work at the Thanhouser-Mutual studios on "Out of the Shadows," featuring Muriel Ostriche, John Reinhard, with John Ward and Frank Wood in support. Elizabeth Gaskins of Denver, Colo., wrote the script.

The fourth of the "Flying A" series, preceded by "In the Firelight," "In the Moonlight," and "Daylight," all of which were especially written by Marc Edmund Jones, the prolific Los Angeles scenario editor, "In the Candlelight" is being put on under direction of Thomas Ricketts. Miss Rich sympathetically portrays the young girl whose life is clouded by the tragedy of a former generation. Mr. Garwood is the young art student whose love brings her freedom and happiness, and Mr. Von Meter plays the embittered father.

The George Kleine offices announce that "Julius Caesar," the mammoth six-part spectacle which required eighteen months to complete, will be ready for booking through the various Kleine branch offices on or about November 10. Advance reports hail "Julius Caesar" as the greatest of the Roman cycle, headed by "Quo Vadis."

In order to get the best atmosphere for a fire scene, Charles Brabin will hereafter select a holiday for the take. The crowd that gathered outside the Edison studio on Columbus Day, to see a house on fire, was so enormous that Director Brabin took advantage of the situation and placed the spectators in the field of the camera. The result was very satisfactory, as will be shown in "The King's Move in the City," the first of the "Young Lord Stranleigh" series.

"The Floating Call" is the title of a thrilling two-reel Reliance-Mutual feature produced by Fred A. Kelsey, Mutual's Los Angeles studios. Irene Hunt is again featured as Helen of the Herald.

"Sweet and Low" has just been completed by "Flying A" company, under direction of Sydney Ayres, and they are now finishing "Redbird Wins," which has been delayed on account of the injury which Mr. Richardson received in an automobile accident.

James Cruze, the Hassam Ali in "Zudora," the forthcoming Thanhouser serial, is being tutored by a native Hindu, in the mystic lure of the Far East, that he may the better portray the wierd, scheming Oriental for which he is cast.

The Phoenix Feature Film Company, Boston zone managers for Sawyer, Inc., are occupying their new offices, 129 Columbus avenue, Boston.

It is seldom one has the pleasure of witnessing such superb acting as is demonstrated by Francis X. Bushman in "The Private Officer," a two-act feature drama to be released shortly by the Essanay company. In this Mr. Bushman plays a dual part and one's feelings alternate spontaneously at seeing Mr. Bushman as the scheming fortune-hunter and at the same time the disappointed but kindhearted lover.

* * *

Settings that savor of the unusual are contained in "The Friend," a powerful story of an artist's devotion that will soon be released by Thomas H. Ince of the New York Motion Picture Corporation. A number of the scenes demanded expensive equipment—such as marble statuary, rich draperies and paintings.

* * *

The National Board of Censorship passed "The Only Authentic Films of the War in Europe," for Sawyer, Inc. The only changes which they required were in titles, because they opposed calling attention to the horrible side of war.

Maurice Blache has returned to New York from Edmonton, Canada, where he has finished developing 12,000 feet of film, representing many months' work photographing wild animals. Mr. Blache, who had previously been with Gaumont in Europe and Selig and American in Chicago and on the Pacific Coast, in the course of his recent engagement traveled as far as the Yukon with pack animals and underwent much hardship. He is now at liberty. His address is in care of the Blache studio, Fort Lee.

Leo Delaney, of the Vitagraph "Old Guard," has rejoined the company and will start again where he left off eight months ago. Mr. Delaney, after several years of diligent work in the Vitagraph life portrayals, has been taking a much needed rest and returns to his labor greatly refreshed and ready to begin all over again.

* * *

In "Destiny's Night," Thomas H. Ince of the New York Motion Picture Corporation offers the movie world a crook story of the different sort. It is constructed around a novel episode in which a gentleman burglar and a society "burglaress" figure, as principals, with a tiny foundling that enters unheralded into the proceedings to climax an unusual love plot.

Captain Harry Lambart, the Vitagraph director, who was struck by lightning last July when Chad Fisher was killed by the same bolt, has not been entirely well since the accident. For the past two weeks he has been confined to his bed attacked with a severe case of malaria which, together with the effects of the lightning stroke, put him in a very bad way. On Monday, October 5, he visited the Vitagraph studios and certainly showed every sign of having been a very sick man. The company has induced him to go away for a few weeks to recuperate and he has decided to locate in the invigorating environments of the Catskill Mountains.

The Alfred Hamburger theaters, including the Ziegfeld, the large downtown Chicago house, are using Shubert and Brady features under a yearly contract, that they entered into with the Chicago office of the World Film Corporation.

Marguerite Snow, who plays the titular role in "Zudora," will afford new admirers the opportunity of observing just how versatile a young woman she is. The role is an unusual one requiring a deal more histrionic art than usual. Miss Snow's work as the Countess Olga in "The Million Dollar Mystery" has made her the most talked of woman in pictures.

Matt Moore, who went to Columbus, Ohio, recently when Stuart Paton took a company there to stage the picture "Of and for the People," tells of an incident in which Governor Cox figured prominently. It was during the scene in which the Governor is supposed to send a telegram to the hero of the piece. Around the table were standing several of the State Senators. The Governor took the telegraph blank and the camera began to click. "Write something," directed Mr. Paton, and this is what the Governor scribbled, while the other politicians looked over his shoulder: "You political stiffs may enjoy all this, but I can tell you that I don't."

Atsco, Inc., is seven years old and is rejoicing in a most appropriate manner—reading all the letters received in the past seven years from hundreds of pleased patrons from all parts of the globe: Calcutta, Honolulu, Japan, China, Australia, England, France, Germany, in fact, every known country that boasts of a moving picture theater also boasts of a Radium Fibre Screen.

What is regarded by Walter Edwards, the Inceville director, as the best story he has ever produced, has just been completed at the studios of the New York Motion Picture Corporation at Santa Monica, Cal., and is being ready for release under the title of "The City of Darkness."

Carlton King, recognized as a most versatile actor, never before has displayed such high-class dramatic talent as in the Edison production, "A Question of Identity," adapted from the novel, "The Window That Monsieur Forgot," by Mary Imlay Taylor, and directed by Charles Brabin.

The "Beauty" Company is busily at work on a scenario by M. R. McKinstry, "The Tightwad." A hard-panned old farmer objects to all modern improvements, and particularly to the running of an electric wire across his place. The young trouble-hunter or lineman, aided by the old man's daughter, circumvents his opposition and he surrenders to the demands of progress. Miss Mineer, Mr. Harris and Mr. Gamble have the leading roles.

"The Only Authentic Films of the War in Europe," released in the United States by Sawyer, Inc., are now playing through Canada under the management of Edwin Bower Hesser, owner of the world rights for the film, which was brought together from several authentic sources on the field of conflict. It will play the three weeks of time controlled by Mr. Hesser.

The Favorite Players are finishing their second release, "The Man Who Could Not Lose," and are now outlining the work to be done on their third production, entitled "The Last Chapter," written by Robert A. Dillon, from an unfinished story by Richard Harding Davis. All indications point to the fact that the Favorite Players will manufacture only films of the highest class, adapted from books of the foremost writers in America.

The Richardsons have taken a larger house on Anacapa street, Santa Barbara, Cal., and are finding fresh inspirations in the glorious sunsets.

Margaret Joslin, the well-known "Sophie Clutts" in the Western Essanay "Snakeville" comedies, is now the proud owner of a handsome machine given her by her husband, Harry Todd, for a birthday present.

Frederick Sullivan, the Thanhouser director who is producing "Zudora," is a nephew of Sir Arthur Sullivan, of "Pinafore" fame. Mr. Sullivan inherits the musical genius of the family and has composed several settings of merit to the poems of Edgar Allen Poe.

Caused by a pressure of business that is hardly believable, Harry Weiss, manager of the Chicago office of the World Film Corporation, finds himself swamped and completely snowed under with work. Four extra employes have been put on to his already large force within the last two weeks. The latest innovation is that he has inaugurated twenty-four hour service in his office. A complete day shift and a complete night shift are now on duty, and midnight in the office is as busy as noontime.

In "Motherhood," a bit of poetic drama from the pen of Olga F. Clark which is being put on by the "Beauty" company, a young wife is shown, through the medium of a dream, the tragedy which may follow her resistance to motherhood. She forgets herself and rejoices in the love which casts out fear.

The public will have an opportunity of witnessing on the screen very beautiful and gorgeous settings in the Edison multiple, "The Colonel of the Red Huzzars." The scenes were taken by Director Ridgely on the magnificent estate of a well-known multi-millionaire, not far distant from New York City.

The class is made up of every employe of the Strand and the head teacher is the managing director, S. L. Rothapfel. The management calls this series of instructions "Emergency Drills" and "Lessons in Courtesy," but the employes have dubbed it "The Sunday School Class." Mr. Rothapfel, the principal, instructs the entire theater personnel in the art of courtesy. R. Alfred Jones, the house manager, is the instructor in the fire drills, and Dr. J. Victor Wilson the house physician, gives lessons on "First Aid to the Injured."

Through this medium she learns of the smuggling plot and assists her sweetheart, a young secret service officer, to bring the smugglers to justice. In the cast are Howard Crampton and Edward Mortimer.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

A CHANCERY receivers' sale of the Scenic, a moving picture theater, its equipment and the lease to the property at 1305 Wisconsin avenue, Northwest, at public auction will be conducted upon the premises at four o'clock p. m., Monday, October 19. The property will be first offered as a whole, and if not sold will be offered in detail. This theater is well established and equipped and doing a good business. Michael F. Mangan and Edward B. Eynon, Jr., are receivers for the property. Application for the appointment of receivers was made by Victor H. Stonesifer, who said that the business had been operated under the joint management of himself, Stella Hetherington, of Fayette City, Pa., and Kate V. Bailey, of Toronto, Canada, and that recently differences have arisen that make it impossible for the joint conduct of the enterprise to continue. The lawyers for the ladies admitted the existence of differences of opinion as to the management and agreed to the appointment of the receivers.

Those moving picture exhibitors who desire to continue in business during the coming twelve months had better see about the renewal of their licenses, for a notice from Wm. P. Richards, assessor for the District of Columbia, informs of the expiration of these and other licenses on October 31.

Joy, confectioner, and former proprietor of the Niagara theater, on Seventh street, Northwest, last week filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy in the District Supreme Court, placing his liabilities at something over six thousand dollars and his assets at over one thousand dollars. He was adjudged a bankrupt and his case referred to Ralph D. Quinter, referee in bankruptcy in whose offices, 19-21 Century building, this city, will be held the first meeting of his creditors at 11 a. m., October 20, at which time his creditors may attend, prove their claims, appoint a trustee, examine the bankrupt, and transact such other business as may properly come before the meeting.

The Red Room was used for this purpose. After the exhibits were straightened out these ladies kindly consented to pose for a cameraman, who got several hundred feet of what should be good live material. The showing of this film in other cities in which similar shows are to be held should prove advantageous to the exhibitor who can obtain it.

The TuMax theater, in Mt. Rainier, Md., operated by E. M. McClees and J. P. McKallor, is attracting considerable attention in that neighborhood by the many novel stunts they are including in their programs. This house is only open on Tuesdays, Thursday and Saturdays, as Mt. Rainier is not a very large place and would not warrant more shows than that, but there is something doing on each of the evenings mentioned. Tuesday night is always "benefit" night. Last week a benefit performance was given for the Boy Scouts, and on this occasion forty per cent. of the gross receipts was turned over to the youngsters for the purchase of first-aid outfits and accessories. All of these and many more will be present at the Grand Motion Picture Ball, Convention Hall, Saturday, October 31 (Hallow'en)." Around the four sides of the slides are double rows of photographs of the photoplay stars who will be present upon that occasion. Added impetus is being given to the affair by the thousand dollars worth of advertising that has been contributed by the Washington Post. KENTUCKY.

THE moving picture men of Louisville as well as the public have noted with interest the hold that moving pictures are now proving to have, and how they are beginning to be recognized as part of the city's regular round of entertainment.

The Seelbach Hotel, of Louisville, which is one of the finest hotels in the South, recently had a bulletin board made and has it on display in the big marble lobby. This bulletin shows what shows are on at the various houses and coming attractions, giving the dates. The Majestic Motion Picture theater, operated by the Majestic Amusement Company, of which Louis Dittmar is the head, is also listed along with the legitimate and vaudeville show houses, which goes to show how well regarded the high-class houses now are with the public, and with visitors. Many traveling men who have to wait over in the city for a few hours, are in the habit of taking in a good motion picture house, whereas they would not take the time or trouble to go to see a regular play. The bulletin is without doubt helping the Majestic theater, and might well be tried out in other cities.

Fred Sheldon, new motion picture house for colored people, to be opened at Preston and Jefferson streets, Louisville, is being delayed to some extent because of the large changes which will have to be made in the old fire engine house and the difficulty in satisfying the building inspector in obtaining a permit.

Gus Mueller, of the Cincinnati office of the Warner Feature Film Corporation; Sam Kramer and Ralph Studevyn, of the Indianapolis office, were in Louisville over last Sunday.

Charles Pressy, of the S. & P. Film & Supply Company, Louisville, is on a trip to Nebraska and other Western points, where he is booking considerable business for the local office. Business with the new concern is picking up rapidly.

The Star theater, Louisville, has been doing very nicely since reducing its prices to five cents. Cold weather has also helped considerably. A set of chimes was recently installed in front of the theater, which are attracting a good deal of attention.

The Orpheum theater, Louisville, which is one of the houses operated by the Princess Amusement Company, is getting exceptionally large Sunday crowds. A two-reel feature and two reels of comedy are generally shown on Sunday.

"A Gentleman from Mississippi," the five-part drama of the World Film Corporation, shown at the Walnut theater Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of last week, made almost as great a hit as the original play did some four years ago.

The private light plant of the Arena theater, of Russellville, Ky., is furnishing light and power for a drug store, the Auditorium and also is charging batteries for a telephone company. The power is generated by a gasoline engine which was recently installed. The Dixie theater is also operating a plant which is selling power and light.

R. S. Bingham, manager of the Princess theater, of Pineville, Ky., is enlarging the fireproof vault in the theater and putting in an additional motion picture machine. Since the latter part of September Keystone comedies are shown three days out of every week.

The Negro Knights of Pythias, of Kentucky, have applied for a permit to erect a building to cost $150,000, at the southeast corner of Tenth and Chestnut streets, Louisville. A picture show will be operated on the first floor of the building. The colored shows are doing better than for some time past, and the negro is beginning to take a real interest in motion pictures.

T. L. Carroll & Company opened a new motion picture house at Bardwell, Ky., and were greeted by a big crowd on the opening night. The people of Bardwell had been anxious to have a picture show for some time and expect to patronize the new industry strongly. The LaCenter Correspondent, the leading newspaper of the town, in remarking about the opening of the picture show said, "Now that we have a theater we will feel like a real city as soon as we obtain water works and electric lights."

A new motion picture show to be opened at Williamstown, Ky., by Howard Youngman, was postponed when it was discovered that the electric equipment failed to generate sufficient current to light the house and operate the projecting machine. The size of the orchestra attracted a large crowd.

Mr. Koenigstein will operate the house himself. G. D. CRAIN, JR.

CINCINNATI.

THE custom of taking motion pictures of events and ceremonies of interest is probably followed more generally here than in any other city in the country, judging by the number of such pictures seen and heard of. For instance, at Keith's theater last week, among other pictures of local interest, there were shown motion pictures of the dedication of the St. Gregory School, recently completed, this feature drawing many people to the theater to experience the unique pleasure of seeing themselves in motion, while it is becoming the rule, rather than the exception, for parades and the like to be embalmed in moving pictures, either for immediate exhibition or for preservation in official records. At the Cincinnati Automobile Show, which was an interesting event of last week, one feature of the entertainment offered visitors was a series of moving pictures showing the details of automobile construction, with a distinct advertising value to the concern which showed them.

The Century theater, on Gilbert avenue, near Peebles Corner, one of the busiest suburban business centers around Cincinnati, was the object of special attention on the part of the assessors, it seems, being taxed at a sum considerably in excess of its value; at any rate, the Syndicate Theaters Co., which controls the house, was successful last week in getting the valuation for taxing purposes reduced by $29,520. The house was operated last season with a combination program of moving pictures and vaudeville, and will probably follow the same arrangement this season. It has not yet been opened, however.

The Orpheum theater, the big Walnut Hills house, near Peebles' Corner, shortly after cooler weather made the closing of its roof garden show necessary, opened its winter garden and cafe, offering an attraction to its patrons for the remainder of the season even more alluring than that of the summer. On Saturday evening, October 3, the winter garden and cabaret were open in full blast, with an excellent attendance, in spite of the fact that mild weather prevailed. With this side attraction to draw business the Orpheum's motion picture season should continue through the winter even better than that of the summer, which was extraordinarily good.

"Neptune's Daughter," Annette Kellermann's motion picture vehicle, held forth at the Victoria theater, in Dayton, last week, with considerable success, audiences evidencing a marked desire to see the "Diving Venus" in her latest play.

Some of the first and by far the best war pictures yet seen in Dayton were shown on Wednesday of last week at the Colonial, drawing splendidly, on account of the general interest in the European struggle. The Colonial has made arrangements for war pictures for Sunday, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of each week, and the management expects to keep the house filled on these days, at least.

By means of the co-operation of all of the moving picture theaters in Springfield, O., last week the depleted funds of the Associated Charities of that city were replenished for the coming winter in splendid style. All of the theaters, including the "legitimate" houses, agreed ten per cent. of their gross receipts during the week to the organization, and by the sale of universal tickets, good in any theater, by workers for the cause, unusually large crowds were the result in all of the theaters, and correspondingly substantial relief was brought about for the charities. The theaters advertised the plan well in advance by means of slides, and helped the thing along nicely, so that the public contributed handsomely, and yet in a way which was not felt to be at all burdensome.

The Springfield Commercial Club signalized its recent visit to Xenia, O., one of the stops on its "get-acquainted" trip in its section of the State, by recording the ceremonies in connection with the visit in motion pictures, which were exhibited in Springfield after the trip, with those taken in other towns. They proved to be interesting and amusing, not only to those who took the trip, but to the people at home, who were thus enabled to see how their trade missionaries did their work on the road.

The United Trades and Labor Council of Dayton, O., has indorsed a grievance held by the Motion Picture Operators' union against one of the houses in that city, and will support the union in its fight on the house, it is understood.

"A Million Bid," the big Vitagraph feature, drew as well last week on a return engagement at the Columbia, Dayton, O., as on its original presentation, showing that motion picture audiences are by no means opposed to seeing something which they have been shown before, or which is not absolutely new, as many exhibitors suppose. The Columbia had over-flowing houses at the former engagement of the feature, however, making it certain that there would be plenty of people left to furnish entirely new audiences, if necessary, on the return engagement.

The Orpheum, at Youngstown, has announced to its patrons that it will hereafter show to its audiences all of the film productions of the World Film Corporation on Wednesday and Thursday of each week. It is understood that the Orpheum is the first house in Ohio to perfect such an arrangement with the World Corporation.

The management of the new Marien theater, on Center street, in Marion, O., announces that the house will be completed and ready for the opening on October 15, without fail. The decorators have been engaged on the interior of the theater for some days, and promise to make it one of the handsomest in Ohio. The great pipe-organ has been installed and is ready for the opening, while other features which are incorporated in the building and its equipment make it up to date in every respect.

The Lyric, of Piqua, O., is drawing good houses with a combination program of pictures and vaudeville, for which an admission of ten cents is charged. As a rule three reels are offered, with a pair of vaudeville acts. On Friday evening of last week a benefit performance for the Piqua branch of the Knights of the Golden Eagle filled the house for every show, netting both the management and the organization a nice profit. INDIANA.

BUSINESS has taken a slump in the last week on account of the summer temperatures. The porch patrons who deserted the front stoop for the picture shows were back with the hammock and the tan, and the nickels did not hit the till with the abundance of the days when the weather was more seasonable. The slacking off was felt all over the state, but more so in the bigger towns, according to information furnished by the exchanges.

The Orpheum, Evansville, is giving green trading stamps every afternoon and night except Sunday and holidays.

The Matthews theater, Monticello, Ind., sold out solid one night last week. Dye & Gardner, local automobile men, wanted to show how 230 Indiana dealers raided the Overland factory at Toledo. The admission was free.

Manager Shobe of the Kentland theater, Kentland, Ind., has a trick of running big specials every now and then, and as he always makes good with something that is special, the townsmen turn out and pack his theater. The specials usually take the form of an extra hour's entertainment, with children under ten admitted free. The children under ten, of course, pull the parents, and Manager Shobe feels that the thing that makes people visit his house is well worth the price if it is a little high. "I want to see them get the habit," he says.

The Behan Film Company, Chicago, filmed the Disease Prevention day parade of floats and other city industries at East Chicago, Ind., and then put the picture on exhibit at the Berry theater the next day.

The American Bioscope Company, Chicago, took pictures of the Disease Prevention day parade at Valparaiso, Ind.

Mrs. J. F. Burns is to open a fine new playhouse at Michigan City, Ind., which she will call the "Willard." The building is new, one-story fireproof, with a seating capacity of 200. The location is a good one and Mrs. Burns feels sure of a good patronage.

The Jefferson Avenue Theatorium, Evansville, under the management of Morris Pfohl, was opened. Roses were given as souvenirs. The house is up-to-date and comfortably seats 300, care being taken not to crowd the seats.

The picture men and the legitimate houses at Anderson, Ind., are embroiled in a scrap with the church element over Sunday opening. The churches will do all in their power to prevent Sunday shows.

L. J. Dunning closed a deal by which the business of the Orpheum theater, Plymouth, Ind., passes to W. B. Stover of Chicago. Mr. Dunning will remain in Plymouth for a time at least, as he says he has no plans for the immediate future.

The National American Suffrage Association film, "Your Girl and Mine," is being made the subject of a great deal of editorial comment from Hoosier editors.

"Cabiria" is being reviewed by Indiana critics and given the same attention as the flesh and blood offerings in the legitimate houses. The Indianapolis Star gave it first position in the colum of dramatic criticism the night of its first showing in Indianapolis. It is showing to crowded houses at the English Opera House.

The Lyceum Company, Terre Haute, Ind., has been incorporated to operate picture shows with $2,400 capital stock; directors, C. R. Boland, Jac. Bernheimer, M. Bernheimer.

The United States Steel Corporation, Gary, Ind., plant has been filmed for exhibit at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, the big corporation appropriating $5,000 to be spent in making the exhibit.

Moving picture shows have been part of the entertainment furnished by the contractors putting in Dam 39 in the Ohio River at Vevay, Ind. The men are far from any sort of excitement and the pictures have been relished. The company has found that the pictures help in keeping better order.

Clarence Moore sold the Princess theater, Williamsport, Ind., to William C. Odle.

Edward S. Stakebaker and his son, Clyde, owners of the Dreamland theater, Union City, have sold out to Mrs. Anna Newbauer of Muncie, Ind. For a time at least, Clyde Stakebaker will serve as manager.

There was no airdome in the immediate neighborhood, and the Juniata had good audiences all summer.

THE photoplaygoers at San Antonio, Tex., were introduced to the Paramount Pictures at the Royal theater through three bargain days offered by the management. The prices on this special occasion were 5 and 10 cents; the regular prices will be 10 and 20 cents.

Boy Scouts of Houston, Tex., were the guests of the Houston Post at a special show of Lyman H. Howe's pictures at the Prince theater.

The Lomo of Hattiesburg, Miss., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $4,000 to operate a moving picture theater. The incorporators are D. E. Edwards, H. O. White and others.

The editor of the Journal at Beaumont, Tex., says he met a man recently who could remember when they had singers in the moving picture theaters. Evidently Texas is pretty well educated in the matter by this time, but not so the whole Southwest.

The Plaza theater at San Antonio, Tex., has opened its regular season and is running five acts of vaudeville and seven reels of pictures.

Edmund Reid, the pioneer moving picture man of Milledgeville, Ga., will be the manager of the new Colonial theater at that place. The new house will seat about 200 persons.

The Star theater has been opened at Salisaw, Okla., by Frank Barr of Fayetteville, Ark., and Ralph Couch of Salisaw.

Propeller fan for removing foul air from theatre. It can be installed in walls, windows, or roof.

Opening a window or door in your theatre will not give ventilation. The influx of cold air may give relief from the hot, stuffy atmosphere which was there before, but it is a poor method of obtaining a comfortable theatre.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

A CORRECTION.

Among the synopses of the Edison Company published on page 380 of last week's issue, will be found two American stories entitled "On the Open" and "The Final Impulse." This is an error that was not caught in proofreading, and exhibitors and others should be careful in making use of these descriptions to see that they are accredited to the proper manufacturers.

THE LYNBROOK TRAGEDY (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 26).—Ruth Malloy, whose father has become a human derelict because of Vivian Gregg, a theatrical star, loves Mitchell, a young playwright. Ruth learns that Vivian is enslaving Mitchell. Despite her efforts the girl is helpless to save him.

Malloy drifts into town. He is filled with a determination to slay the human vampire and avenge his wrongs. Ruth comes upon her father just as he is in the act of aiming his pistol at the actress. Mitchell's eyes are opened. He sees in Malloy, the fate which must be his unless he conquers his infatuation for Vivian Gregg.

Ruth's love helps the boy. For the first time, Vivian Gregg, who has really grown to love Mitchell, realizes the depths of her infamy as she gazes upon the wreck that once was Malloy. Ruth, Mitchell and Malloy hear a shot. Rushing into the library they find Vivian Gregg dead.

THE NO-ACCOUNT COUNT (Oct. 27).—Melinda is so homely that Hardup finds it impossible to land a husband for her. With the arrival in America of the Count De Bluffe, Hardup invites the man to call. Melinda is sent to a beauty doctor to have her face renovated. On his way to the house, De Bluffe has his clothes stolen by Weary Bill, a tramp. The latter impersonates the count and is about to wed Melinda when De Bluffe appears. Compelled to beat a retreat, Weary Bill vows vengeance. The following day, De Bluffe and Melinda are about to wed, when Bill contrives to remove the bride's wig. De Bluffe gives one agonized look upon the awful object before him—and disappears down the road.

THE MENACE OF FATE (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 28). Ethel, the young daughter of the wealthy Wiltons, is stolen by Effie Sprout, a woman of the slums. Fifteen years later the girl has succumbed to her environment. The gentle traits she has inherited, however, come to the surface from time to time. Dr. Westcott becomes interested in Ethel and determines to develop her better self. In attempting to burglarize Westcott's room, Ethel is injured. While in the hospital, she repulses Dr. Westcott's advances, until the latter succeeds in arousing her jealousy. Ethel thereupon attempts suicide. Westcott saves her, and in doing so, discovers Ethel's identity. With the end of her illness, the girl's better nature returns to remain forever and she becomes Westcott's wife.

HAM AND THE VILLAIN FACTORY (Oct. 30).—Called unexpectedly to work, Tad sees his sweetheart going out autoing with Ham, his deadly rival. Later, Tad has a fearful and wonderful dream, based upon the efforts of Ham and himself to win Millicent's hand. The dream ends with the blowing up of Ham by Desperate Gus, manager of a villain factory. Awakening, Tad learns that Ham's auto has broken down, compelling Millicent to walk many miles back to town. Hiring a rig, Tad takes Millicent out driving and passes the spot where Ham stands, swearing at his machine.

THE VENGEANCE OF WINONA (Oct. 31).—Upon Winona's promise to wed the avenger of her brother's death, Antelope and Red Owl, rivals for her hand, set forth on their mission. Later, Red Owl's cowardice causes him to flee when Winona is captured by the renegades who have slain her brother. Antelope engages the slayers, however, and kills them single-handed, although it apparently costs him his life. Winona spurns Red Owl, who asks her to be his squaw, declaring herself to be Antelope's widow, in accordance with the terms of her promise. Antelope is not dead, however, and Winona later becomes his bride.

EDISON.

WOOD B. WEDD AND THE MICROBES (Eleventh of the Series—Oct. 26).—Wood B. Wedd, disappointed in his effort to find the one woman in all the world, lost most of his enthusiasm for matrimony. Jenks was determined he should marry. He decided that Miss Seraphina Brown would make a splendid wife for his friend. An introduction was arranged. Everything went along beautifully until Wood B. Wedd decided to propose. Miss Seraphina was a lady of strong and peculiar ideas, and her actions on being proposed to startled Wood B.

First, she looked him over, then, taking a tape measure from her pocket, she began to take measurements, thumped his chest, listened to his heart's action, etc. Satisfied with her examination, she produced a document which she asked Wood B. to sign. To his horror, he found that he was No. 13 on the eligible list. Despite his protestations, she forced him to sign. Wood B, thoroughly bewildered, consulted his friend Darby Jenks. They were in the midst of a discussion when word came from Miss Seraphina asking Wood B. to come to her house immediately.

On their arrival at the house, Miss Seraphina and her maid took them in charge, charging their minds with warnings against microbes and infection that they hardly knew what to do. The vacuum cleaner was brought into operation on their clothes—they were sprayed and fumigated and finally Seraphina decided that a vapor was the only thing for Wood B. He resisted valiantly, but finally they all went off, leaving him in the bath cabinet, while the mercury slowly climbed. Wood B. decided that it was too much, and managed to make his escape, clad only in the bath cabinet. No. 13 had worked, and once more he had failed in his matrimonial adventures.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SEALED ART GALLERY (Twelfth of the Chronicles of Cleek Series—Oct. 27). Hamilton Cleek was spending a week at the home of his fiancee. His every thought was foreign to crime, when he was called to the phone by Superintendent Narkom. A peculiar robbery had been committed in the home of Parovitch, a famous African traveller. Cleek consented to meet Narkom at Parovitch's residence.

Arriving there he discovered that a valuable necklace had suddenly disappeared from a box in the art gallery. Cleek examined the entire house and his suspicions centered upon Parovitch's son, only to be upset by a remark of the maid that she had been startled the night before by meeting a giant monkey. Cleek reexamined the gallery, and noticing several sprays of fern on the floor, set about accounting for them, when he came upon the necklace hidden in a fern pot near the door. Notwithstanding a peculiarity in the baseboard of the room, he discovered that one of the picture frames covered a secret entrance. Examination of the adjoining room brought the revelation that the blind nephew was not blind, but sat in his room calmly reading.

Cleek communicated his findings to Narkom and arranged for him to enter the nephew's room when all the others were gathered in the art gallery. The trap was carefully laid. After convincing Parovitch of his nephew's duplicity, Cleek confronted the boy with the necklace and accused him of taking it. The nephew denied the accusation. Cleek stepped to the wall and extinguished the lights. To everyone's surprise, when the lights were again turned on the nephew had disappeared. In a moment Superintendent Narkom entered the secret entrance, leading the "blind" boy, handcuffed. The boy's ingenuity was proven as Narkom carried the suit of monkey clothes which he had worn as a disguise.

THE LOST MELODY (Oct. 28).—Mutual love of music served to bring Roger and Mary together. Her accompaniments of his cello playing brought out all the subtle beauties. The growth of their romance was noted by Roger's mother, who loved the girl's sweet, tender ways.

A discordant note was struck when Darkin, playing upon a secret hold which he had on Roger's father, insisted upon thrusting himself and his daughter, Rose, upon Stewart's home circle. Having social ambitions for his daughter, Darkin used his influence upon Stewart to bring about the marriage of Roger and Rose. The young musician had written a beautiful song dedicated to Mary, and under its influence, and that of her presence, he declared his love for her. His father, overhearing this, came into the room just as Mary left, and demanded of Roger that he give up his plans concerning Mary and marry Rose. Roger was thunderstruck and refused to listen to it. Furious, Stewart stormed about, and took up the manuscript, tore it, and throwing them into the fire, rushed out of the room.

Mr. Stewart had better success in his appeal to Mary. He confessed Darkin had information that would ruin him if Roger did not marry Rose, and begged Mary to give up his son. She pitied the old man so that she agreed and wrote a note to Roger telling him that things could not be as he wished.

Darkin, impatient at the delay, wrote a threatening letter to Stewart, demanding immediate action. As he was reading it, Mrs. Stewart rushed in and informed him of Mary's departure. Roger was in despair. Again he tried to recall the melody of his song, but failed. When his father made a second appeal, with a full confession of his crime, convincing Roger that Darkin would carry out his threat unless his terms were complied with, Roger sadly consented to marry Rose to protect his father.

Throughout the succeeding years he sought vainly for the melody. Ten years after his sad marriage he was seated in church when suddenly his wonderful melody was played. Entranced, he sat listening, as the congregation slowly left. He made his way to the organ loft and there found Mary. A few words bared the whole truth. Reading the look in Mary's eyes, indicating that Rose was gone, by showing her the mourning band on his arm, Roger begged her to listen once more to his love. Bowing her head, Mary came slowly toward him, and the lost melody was found.

THE MIDNIGHT RIDE OF PAUL REVERE (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 30).—The eighteenth day of April, 1775, still lives in the hearts of all loyal Americans, as the birthday of our country. It was the day the first shots were fired against the British at Lexington. Throughout the years of privation and suffering which followed, that same spirit of the "minute men" endured up to the very last, when Lord Cornwallis surrendered his army on the nineteenth day of October, 1781, American independence was assured.

Of all the characters of our Revolutionary period, none is more endeared to all than that of Paul Revere, whose exploit has been immortalized by Longfellow so effectively that the lines of the poem and the incidents portrayed are graven more deeply, perhaps, upon the average American mind than any other character or exploit of our American history.

When Revere learned of the British commander's intention of attacking the patriot's base of supplies in Concord, and told his friend to

"Hang a lantern aloft in the belfry arch,
Of the North Church tower as a signal light,"

he little realized that the tiny light would serve as a beacon of liberty for future generations, but so it has proven and we follow him today as he clattered along the country-side, rousing the men to fight for their life and our liberty, and our pulses beat with each stride of the mount.

THE HAND OF IRON (Oct. 31).—Steel's reputation as a martinet served to eliminate him from his companions, both officers and men, and Yardley took advantage of this fact to humiliate him, hoping to influence the opinion of Helen Taylor, for whose hand they were both striving. Yardley's remarks bore sudden fruit when Helen's plans were interfered with by Steel on the grounds that the use of government material was against the regulations, and fuel was added to the flame when Colonel Taylor sided with Steel. Helen was furious and decided to join Yardley in his plan.

Leading him on, she brought him to the point of proposing, then openly insulted him. As he moved away, bewildered, the hurt look in his eyes haunted her, and as Yardley arrived and attempted to congratulate her, she turned away from him, disgusted. Later, troubles necessitated calling out the troops. Steel was placed in command of a detachment, but was warned by Colonel Taylor not to fire upon the strikers under any circumstances.

When the troops reached the trouble, it was discovered that their greatest difficulty lay in offsetting the influence of Ryan, the local politician, who urged the men to pay no attention to the soldiers, as they dare not shoot. A volley of stones greeted them. Steel was knocked insensible. Yardley, noting the restlessness of the men under this attack, knew not what to do. He decided to give the order to fire, but Steel recovered just in time to prevent the volley. Gathering his strength, he went directly after Ryan. After a tussle, the politician gave in. Hostilities being averted, the troops were withdrawn. The actions of the two men caused Helen to realize that Steel had been woefully maligned, and her choice was quickly made.

VITAGRAPH.

THE CAVE DWELLERS (Oct. 26).—While out walking with Daddy and Mother, Sonny Jim finds a spooky-looking cave in the hill-side and starts to explore it, but is prevented by Daddy. Sonny tells his boy friends about the cave and they run away, leaving notes for their parents saying they are going to become cavemen. After exploring the mysteries of the cave, all go in for a swim in a lake nearby. On their return to the cave, one of them nonchalantly fills his father's pipe with tobacco and lights up. The others are envious, and after some persuasion, he lets them try smoking it. All but Sonny, who only took one puff, become deathly sick. Meantime, the several fathers and mothers find the notes and there is great excitement. Daddy Jim remembers the cave in the hillside, and tells the others that the boys must be there. To teach the youngsters a lesson, the men tie handkerchiefs over their faces, mask-fashion, and, followed by the mothers, proceed to the cave. It is now dark and the youngsters are huddled together in the cave beginning to get frightened. Suddenly they hear a noise outside. Sonny cheerfully whispers, "It sounds like a lion!" Then the masked men stalk in while the boys' hearts almost stop beating. The men lead the boys outside. The women appear and a joyful reunion follows. On their way home, Sonny sleepily whispers in Daddy's ear he guesses he would rather be "just Daddy's little boy than a cave-dweller."

THE BUTTERFLY (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 27).—Vivacious and pretty, Nancy North, the butterfly daughter of Elias North, a financial magnate, is courted by Lord Cheuxcheux, Baron Frankfurter, Count Vitcheyitch, Marquis D'Estingue and Ned Bangs, her oldest friend. Each of her suitors happens to propose on the same day and she tells each one to call the following day to receive his answer. Ned is suddenly called away and leaves in Nancy's care a beautiful necklace of pearls, belonging to the Duchess Gogetti, who had asked the young man to sell them for her. Finding the Duke trying to make love to Nancy, the Duchess threatens him with divorce and notifies Ned she has changed her mind about selling the pearls. He returns and asks Nancy for them. She is horrified to find they have disappeared. Finding Mr. North's glasses in Nancy's room, Ned accuses him point-blank of stealing the necklace. He finally confesses; "I used them to secure a loan, and if the market does not turn, I'm ruined!" The various noblemen call to secure their answers and being in love with the North fortune principally, and the girl only incidentally, get a bad scare when the family lawyer whispers Mr. North is about to fail. That gentleman himself appears, however, and reassures all that his money is safe. Nancy arranges that the one whose card the Duchess draws from a hat, she will marry. By a little strategy, Nancy arranges things to suit herself, and the Duchess draws—Ned's card! The nobles are greatly crestfallen and disgustedly take their leave, while Ned, with a whoop of joy, takes Nancy in his arms. Mr. North, with a tender look in his eyes, asks the Duchess to remember him when she gets her divorce, while Nancy and Ned laughingly cry, "Bless you, my children!"

WILLIAM HENRY JONES' COURTSHIP (Oct. 28).—Because of her sister Mabel's sparkling personality, Ivy Smyles, a rather shy young girl, generally occupies the back-ground at their social affairs. While Mabel is out of town, Ivy is introduced to William Henry Jones, a wealthy young man. He is very near-sighted and without his glasses almost blind. Ivy foolishly writes Mabel the wealthy Mr. Jones is calling on her. Mabel is furiously jealous and comes home post haste. When Jones sees Mabel, he is dazzled and Ivy is temporarily forgotten. Shortly afterwards Mr. Jones breaks his glasses and when he meets Mabel does not recognize her. She is astounded and decides the man must be intoxicated. Jones goes on to Mabel's home and proposes to Ivy, whom he believes to be Mabel. She is rather confused but gladly consents to their engagement. Mabel arrives home and Ivy ecstatically tells her of her engagement, exhibiting a ring as proof. Mabel is terribly angry. Jones receives Mr. Smyles' consent to marry Mabel and Papa Smyles congratulates her. She insists it is Ivy who is engaged to Jones. Smyles, greatly puzzled, writes Jones a strong letter. Ivy visits her fiance and asks him what it all means. He explains his mistake, but tells her he has decided he really loves her (Ivy) after all. Looking closely at the girl to make sure he is talking to the right one, Jones takes her in his arms and they are soon planning their coming marriage.

KIDDING THE BOSS (Oct. 29).—The boss of "Bar 4" Ranch is a grouch and a woman-hater, besides insisting all those working for him shall also renounce the fair sex. "Shorty," one of the boys, suggests they "put one over" on the boss. They place an "ad" in the paper, stating the owner of a ranch would like to correspond with an unmarried lady. Object, matrimony. Pattie Jones, a young wage-slave, replies, saying she is no beauty and not too young, but can cook. Imagining her to be a scrawny old maid, who will create a small riot of fun, the boys send for her. On the day of her arrival, a tall, thin maiden lady gets off the train. The boys pick her up bodily and carry her screaming and struggling to the ranch. The indignant lady finally convinces them she is "Priscilly Perkins," the constable's sister, and the boys, disgusted, go back to the station. In the meantime Pattie has arrived at the station and is driven to the Bar 4 ranch. There she meets the foreman, who promptly loses his heart. He introduces her to the boss and tells him she has come to marry the boss of the ranch. He makes the air blue for a while, but, she quiets him and when she tells him she is out of a job and shows him the letter sent by the boys, he begins to feel sorry for the girl. The boys return to the ranch and feel pretty small on learning the result of their "joke." They offer to give Pattie her return fare, but the foreman speaks up, confesses his love and proposes to Pattie. The boss is delighted, gives him his blessing and at once

"NEWMAN"
Brass Frames and Rails

Mr. Chas. O. Hildinger, of the Hildinger, Bishop & Lamont Theatrical Enterprises of Trenton, N. J., says, "There is nothing can compare with 'NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES' for lobby display use. They put life to the lobby, make a favorable impression on the public, and add that touch of refinement which all in all means bigger patronage. I am dead stuck on 'NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES,' and that's all there is to it."

Mr. Hildinger expresses the same opinion as all other exhibitors using "NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES." They know the merits of metal frames, their superiority over frail wooden ones, and the money they are saving by NEWMAN frames' everlasting qualities.

You, Mr. Exhibitor, who have not been educated to this peerless method of lobby display, should write in to us immediately for new 1914 catalog, just chucked full of different style frames to meet every requirement.

"BUNNY BACKSLIDES (Oct. 30).—While Flora Winslow, a widow is engaged to Bunny, she attends a lecture on eugenics and decides that her intended husband is too fat. She tells him he must reduce, and as she wishes to become stouter, they agree to attend Dr. Sweatem's Sanitarium. In the gymnasium they are introduced to Violet Small, a stout young lady, who starts a flirtation with Bunny. The widow and he are then given some very strenuous exercise, with the various apparatus, cross-country runs, etc. Flora becomes jealous of Bunny's attentions to Violet and quietly suggests an idea to the doctor, who agrees with her. Bunny is invited by the doctor to take a ride in his automobile. Violet also asks to go and the doctor consents. They whiz over the roads until opposite a sign post reading, "10 miles to Dr. Sweatem's Sanitarium." There the doctor asks the pair to alight, throws in the clutch and is off for home, shouting back the gladsome announcement, "You can both have a nice walk home!" The two wearily trudge back the way they came. After being chased by a wild bull, tearing their clothes on barbed wire and falling into a stream, the two sit down to rest. Bunny's beating heart refuses to be still until he has declared his love for the fair Violet. She consents to become his wife and on reaching the Sanitarium, they decide to elope. He forces a chauffeur to drive them in his machine to the nearest minister, where Bunny and Violet are soon united in the bonds of wedlock, each content with the other.

WITHIN AN ACE (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 31).—On shipboard, Edwin Forrester, a middle-aged Scotchman, makes the acquaintance of Tom Munroe, a confidence man. Forrester discloses the fact that he is going to visit his ranch in Western America, also that he has but one relative, a niece, Ethel, in England. Munroe's greed aroused, he determines to kill Forrester, then gain possession of his property by assuming his victim's identity. In America, he accompanies Forrester to a suburb for a day or two of golf, where, at the hotel, he registers the Scotchman as his own brother, to prevent identification of his victim. On the links he kills Forrester, and escapes with his papers. The body is discovered by two golfers, Jack Heriot and Dick Anderson, but the identity of the dead man remains a mystery. Some time later Dick makes the acquaintance of Ethel, the niece, who is in America to pay a surprise visit to Forrester. Their destinations are the same and at the station he is met by his friend Heriot, who drives them to the Forrester ranch, where the two friends leave her. The following day, Munroe, representing himself as Forrester, arrives, not expecting to find the niece there. She recognizes at once that this man is not her uncle, and denounces him. He attempts to sieze her, but she escapes in his team. He fires a shot which strikes her in the arm, but she continues at full speed to Heriot's home, where she convinces the two men Munroe is an impostor. They send for the Sheriff, and after a desperate chase, Munroe is hunted down and shot. Dick Anderson becomes a regular caller at Ethel's home, and it soon becomes evident that Forrester's estate will have a new master.

SELIG.

PLAYING WITH FIRE (Special—Two Parts—October 26).—Mary Ransom lives happily with her husband, John Ransom, and their two-year-old boy. Ransom is a prosperous business man. Horton is an old friend of the family and takes advantage of this fact to intrude his attentions upon the wife of his friend. Mary is not unwilling to receive homage and pleasant little attentions from Horton, although she is wholly honest and has no intention of doing anything which would arouse the criticism of her husband. But Horton realizes that many weak women are fond of receiving attentions from their male friends, and while innocent in spirit, will permit themselves to become entangled in the meshes of a flirtation. Horton takes advantage of these conditions, and while posing as a friend of the family, so comports himself that Mary, with whom he has fallen deeply in love, cannot complain of his attentions, yet she is embarrassed by them and would be free from his friendship.

One evening John returns home to find Mary entertaining Horton in the parlor. He notices the familiar way which Mary uses toward Horton and the manner in which Horton goes a little too far in his attentions for genuine friendship. John realizes what this familiarity may lead to, and he talks seriously with Mary upon the subject. He insists that she shall not be so familiar with Horton, whereupon she, perfectly innocent of any wrong intention, declares that her husband is too strict, and the interview concludes with hot words, while Mary dissolves into tears. She does not realize that his interference is based upon his deep love for her. She considers that he is intruding upon her liberties, but later on, after putting their little boy to bed, they become reconciled and Mary promises to be less foolish in the future in her conduct toward Horton.

The best intentions which Mary has formed are disregarded upon the following day when Horton, in his automobile, espies her on the sidewalk. He invites her to enter his car and join him in a ride. Mary declines politely, but Horton insists that she shall accompany him, and taking her by the arm, urges her into the automobile. Mary cannot resist. As a result of their trip, the car breaks down, Mary is late for dinner and there is another scene with her husband. Horton writes a warm letter to Mary, which John intercepts. Horton forces his attentions upon Mary in a restaurant, and John discovers them together without perceiving where the fault lies. However, for the sake of their boy, John endeavors to believe Mary.

The Ransoms visit their summer bungalow in the mountains. Horton traces them there and lies in wait until Mary visits the village.

Horton adopts a subterfuge for getting John back to the city, by sending him a fake telegram announcing that business demands his return. John goes away, leaving Mary alone in the cabin. After seeing the deluded husband depart on the train, Horton visits the cabin and pretends to be badly hurt. Mary assists the hypocrite and makes him comfortable. Horton is filled with glee at the success of his ruse, and proceeds to force his attentions upon Mary, until interrupted by the sounds of the approach of Ransom, who has unexpectedly returned, owing to a railroad accident. With this apparently unexplainable evidence before his eyes, John Ransom believes the worst. He has a fight with Horton, who wounds him in the shoulder and then escapes from the cabin. John believes his wife faithless and turns her from his door.

The years pass, and Mary becomes a nurse in a hospital. She regrets deeply her weakness and foolishness which led her into familiarity with Horton, but she has not found a way to convince John that she was not guilty of a greater sin.

Horton becomes weakened and ill through intemperance and excesses. His physicians advise that he shall spend the balance of his shortened life in a hospital where he can be cared for. His days are numbered and he realizes that his misspent life is almost at an end.

The duty of nursing Horton falls to Mary. She recognizes the man who has wrecked her life. She persuades him to sign a confession revealing his entire duplicity and exonerating her from blame. The confession is written and signed by Horton. With trembling fingers, Mary encloses a copy in an envelope and mails it to her husband. John reads the confession and ponders it carefully. He cannot believe it. He tears the confession into fragments and casts them into the fire. The leaping flames destroy with these fragments all the hopes of Mary for a reconciliation.

WHY THE SHERIFF IS A BACHELOR (Oct. 27).—The sheriff is in love with a beautiful widow. The widow has a brother who is in secret a rascal and a member of a gang of bandits. The sheriff and the widow have arrived at an understanding and she is wearing his ring.

One day four masked men ride into the village, loot the bank, terrorize the community and ride away with a big sack of gold. The sheriff goes in pursuit, and after a lot of shooting, fast riding and acrobatic horsemanship, the bank looters are caught. When the masks are removed, the sheriff discovers to his consternation that the brother of the handsome widow is the chief of the band. Duty stares at him with unsmiling face. The widow pleads for the release of her brother, but the sheriff resists her request. He keeps the prisoner and gives up the woman.

THE WASP (Oct. 28).—John Ward, a political "boss," has been nick-named "The Wasp," because of his power to "sting" his opponents. He is in deadly contest with Charles Melvin, Independent candidate for governor. Melvin has a son, Hal, a fine looking and manly fellow, who is engaged to Clara Clark, a beautiful society girl. Melvin has a clean record, but he is the target for "The Wasp," who opposes him politically. "The Wasp" plans with unscrupulous hirelings to injure Melvin's candidacy by ruining the reputation of Hal, who has made such a thing possible by his big-hearted charity, and his visits to the tenement occupied by old man Collins and his daughter, Marie, who has made the mistake of loving not wisely, but too well. Dick Little, Secret Service operative, aided by Ruth Cahill, thwarts the plot.

THE GRATE IMPEERYUL SIRKUS (Oct. 30).—Tommy Smith has made friends with "Toddles," the circus elephant, but the circus is not popular because the minister has preached against it, therefore making business bad. Tommy and some of his playmates rig up a circus of their own, and borrow the household pets of the minister, the deacon, etc. "Toddles," feeling himself neglected in the circus tent, wanders out and appears before Tommy and his boy partners. They greet the elephant with a shout of approval and proceed to tie all of the gocarts, toy wagons, etc., in the neighborhood in his train, including the cages in which they have incarcerated the pets of the church workers. Then "Toddles," thinking his visit complete, starts back to the circus tent, hauling behind him a long line of toy wagons, followed by a multitude of shouting children.

Everybody in the village follows the crowd, but on arriving at the circus entrance, the children go in free while the grown-ups must buy tickets. The church workers expostulate and try to enter the tent in order to claim their household pets, which have been kidnapped by the children. All buy tickets and this brings prosperity again to the circus.

AT THE TRANSFER CORNER (Oct. 31).—Old man Marshall gives his son, John, a bank roll to start in business for himself, because he is displeased with the young man's methods. John sees a pretty girl transferring from one street car to another at a certain corner. He sees her repeat the incident for several days, and in order to facilitate becoming acquainted with her, he buys the cigar stand located at the transfer corner. Millie pretends to be a poor working girl, while John pretends to be a simple cigar seller.

But Millie's mother is a wealthy widow. She and John's father become acquainted accidentally through their mutual insistence that each is trying to arrange a marriage between the young people. One evening a mysterious telephone message informs both parents that their offspring are eloping from the transfer corner. Each orders out the family automobile and they start in pursuit. John, who is friendly with the bicycle cops and other police, creates a blockade, in the excitement of which the parents are rudely arrested and taken to the police station. John agrees to "fix it" for the release if they will agree to his marriage to Millie.

COLUMBUS.

MULLIGAN'S GHOST (Oct. 27).—Mulligan loses his hod-carrier job on account of "booze." Arriving home, he finds Murphy spooning with his old woman. He kicks Murphy out, whereupon a scrap with his old woman ensues, with the result that Mulligan leaves home. At the river bank an idea comes—he plans to leave his clothing on the bank with a note to his wife, telling her that he has committed suicide, all the time intending to return, collect the insurance money, so that he and his old woman may return to Ireland.

His clothing is found, insurance collected by his wife and all would have been well if the old woman had not promptly transferred her affection to Murphy. This state of affairs Mulligan encounters on his return at nightfall. Being officially dead, he dare not say a word.

He submits to being confined in the attic all the while a dumb, suffering witness to his wife's perfidy—even to their plans for an early wedding. He endures this state of affairs until after the wedding ceremony has been performed. He then declares her a bigamist, threatening her with terrible consequences. On her bended knees, the now penitent wife offers to return the insurance money. Mulligan relents and they start happily off to Ould Ireland.

ESSANAY.

RIVALRY AND WAR (Oct. 26).—Kroutmeyer owns a bakery while Schmidt runs a delicatessen store next door. They fight continually and when each receives a letter informing him that he is nominated for alderman, war in general is declared. Schmidt has a greater following that Kroutmeyer, until the latter promises to serve beer to his listeners. Schmidt is then left alone. After carrying on a bitter campaign, they are told that their nomination was a mistake. They then decide to be friends and become partners in a department store. It is not long before they are again in a heated argument, so they draw a line and each agrees to stay on his side. This plan works until their "lady love" arrives, then hostilities are resumed.

AN UNPLANNED ELOPEMENT (Oct. 27).—Frank Melbourne, a society chap, has a quarrel with his sweetheart, Dorothy, and out of spite becomes engaged to Amy Carrington. The night before he is to be married, he injures his friend, Courtland, in a friendly wrestling bout. It comes out in the newspapers that Courtland was killed, and Amy refuses to marry him until he is cleared. At Amy's home Frank meets Dorothy, the only girl he ever loved. She accompanies him to the steamer, he having decided to go to Europe. She lingers too long on the boat and is carried to sea. Frank begs her to marry him as soon as they reach Paris. She consents, and when they return to New York they find Courtland waiting for them. The news of his death was caused by a bungling nurse, and the article was corrected in a later edition.

THE FABLE OF THE PEOPLE'S CHOICE WHO ANSWERED THE CALL OF DUTY AND TOOK SELTZER (Oct. 28).—The political bosses knew it was an off year and they needed a Goat to run for City Clerk. They didn't want a regular guy to get "stepped on," so they started out to find a Fish. They found a nice man who ran a feed store and had lots of coin,, so they pounced on him. Mr. Bolivar was his name and he drank malted milk and said "whom" and did everything that was nice. They jollied him until he really thought that he was the man for the position, and when his wife tried to save the poor simp, he only said he must answer the call of duty, that the Peepul wanted him. He sometimes wondered if the other fellow would get any votes at all. Little by little the bosses were drawing on his bank account, and on the night of election he was broke. He lost the fight by 20,000 votes, and when he looked for his pushers, they had skipped. Moral: There is one crop that never fails.

SNAKEVILLE AND THE CORSET DEMONSTRATOR (Oct. 29).—Handbills are distributed among the inhabitants of Snakeville, advertising the fact that Sophie Clutts, who has the most perfect figure in the world, will demonstrate straight-back corsets at the Blue Front Emporium the following evening. Slippery Slim, the barber, is the first one to spy her when she arrives, and hastens to give her all the assistance possible. Sophie has the attention of all the men in town, much to the disgust of their wives, and Slim, who is a bachelor, is the only one who fails to make an impression. After being kicked out of the house by Sophie's suitors, Slim climbs to the roof and tries to smoke them out by stuffing up the chimney. His plan is effective, but he is caught and tied to the chimney, where he gets the "smoking."

BRONCHO BILLY'S MOTHER (Oct. 31).—The entire town is terrorized. Broncho Billy has again been drinking and is shooting at everything in sight. After "shooting up" a saloon and grocery store Broncho goes to his cabin where he falls asleep. The sheriff and his men arrive, and after a fierce struggle overpower him. The man stationed outside suddenly rushes in and informs them that Broncho's mother has arrived to pay him a visit. The news quickly sobers Broncho, and the sheriff seeing his distress, pins his star on him, and himself dons the handcuffs. When his mother enters she thinks Broncho is the sheriff, and takes pity on the prisoner. Broncho reforms after this kind deed and swears never to drink again.

WHATSOEVER A WOMAN SOWETH (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 30).—Pauline Marlowe and Robert Caldwell have set the date on which they are to be married. A few days before the wedding, Robert's father is proven to be an embezzler, and it is a great question in Pauline's mind whether she shall marry Robert, despite the fact that his name is blackened, or whether she should face the comments of the unsympathetic public. She decides to turn from him and afterwards marries, only to find that her married life is unhappy—that she loves only Robert. He has gone away, struggled and fought alone, and at last returned to his home to take the position as president of the very bank which his father had robbed. Meanwhile Pauline's husband has died and her interests are centered alone in her son Arthur, who, like his father, has been a great disappointment. Now a young man of twenty-three, he and his mother return home. He is put to work in a law office where he proves a failure. He talks back to Pauline's father, who is overcome and dies of heart failure. Up to this time Robert Caldwell has avoided her, but now in her sorrow he goes to her and arranges for Arthur to take a position in his bank. Time passes; Arthur is tempeted and falls. Not until he meets the one girl in the world, does he realize what he has done. Robert learns of his dishonesty and feels it his duty to tell Pauline. He does so, and she, realizing that she is reaping as she sowed, demands that he pays the penalty. Robert pleads with her to forgive her son and promises not to prosecute him. Anita, Arthur's sweetheart, remains true to him through all his trouble, and Pauline only wishes that she had been as broad minded in her younger days. Realizing the great generosity of Robert, and the big mistake she has made, she goes to the one man whose love she has denied herself for so many years, and he accepts her with open arms.

LUBIN.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURER, NO. 7, THE HOLD UP (Oct. 26).—Lord Cecil, having learned the value of the mining stock which was thought to be worthless, is hurrying East, on his way back to England. On the train he makes the acquaintance of Silas Meggs, an old man, who confides in him his romance—how, forty years before he, Silas, a laborer, had loved Jane Henderson, the daughter of the great man of the village; how the banker, discovering the affair, had forced the girl to write a note which sent Silas into the far West, to vainly seek ease of his heartache; how, at the end of two-score years, he had gone back to his native village, to learn that Jane had been faithful through all the long waiting; how he found her, sweet and beautiful in age as she had been in youth, at the poor farm, the once-wealthy banker having died penniless, and now Silas, having sold his mining claims, was now on his way to make the sweetheart of his youth his wife. The money which would ensure rest and happiness for their remaining years the old man carried with him. The train is held up by a small band of outlaws and the passengers are stripped of their valuables by one of the band while the others keep guard over the train crew and prepare to loot the express car. Old Silas is robbed of his treasure and the hope of making Jane happy at last. The cruelty of this misfortune stirs Cecil to swift action. Seizing an opportunity, he knocks out the bandit nearest to hand, possesses himself of his guns, and gives battle to the remainder of the band. In a few moments, the train men rallying to his assistance, Cecil has rounded up the outlaws, and the future of the aged sweethearts is reassured. A few hours later Silas gets off at his station, and Cecil feels fully repaid as he sees the joyous smile which which old Jane welcomes him.

LOVE AND TITLE (Oct. 27).—Jasper Groan is very much opposed to his daughter's love for the Count Linski and forbids her to see him again, but Cupid's arrow was too sharp and bearing a full amount of love germ, the sweet love it carried could not be denied, so Kittie insisted the Count should be her husband. Father, having failed, resorts to trickery and bribes the iceman to pose as the Count's wife. The next day, at the appointed hour for the Count's appearance, the iceman calls with four children. Father introduces the supposed family of the Count to the daughter, who will not believe it. The Count enters, and when confronted with the situation, becomes furious and chases the iceman to a lake in which both get a good ducking. Father and daughter follow to see that no harm comes to them and a reconciliation follows.

SHE MARRIED FOR LOVE (Oct. 27).—Mrs. Muggs insists that her daughter, Rose, shall marry the Deacon, who is no chicken, but the Deacon is more than willing. Harry Bounce, an acrobat, comes to board with Mrs. Muggs during his vacation. Rose sees him practicing and thinks she will try it. She gets a lot of black and blue marks, but she is game. Harry, seeing how the ground lies, suggests that she marry him and go on the stage. She is tickled to death with the idea and practices so faithfully that she quickly becomes an efficient tumbler. With the tricks learned, she starts in to get rid of the Deacon. He calls to take her for a walk and soon is startled when she does a cart wheel; but this is nothing to some of her somersaults when they meet a couple of maiden ladies, and that in turn is not as bad as her doing a couple of hand stunts in front of the church pillars. Then the minister wants to consult the Deacon and turns to find Rose walking his clothesline. That's enough for the Deacon. He takes Rose back to her mother and breaks the engagement, immediately getting engaged to an old maid rather against his will. The mother fires Rose out of the house, but she is reconciled to the marriage when Rose writes her that with her husband they are making $250 a week and sends a check for $50.

THE MOUNTAIN LAW (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 28).—The famous Hurf-Tyler feud is ended when the factions sign a peace-pact in the Hurf yard and Bob Tyler slips away to join his sweetheart, Betty Hurf. Old Jim Tyler interrupts the lovers, and Betty attacks him tooth and nail. Bob tries to soothe her but sees that she nurses a grudge. Next day cowardly Bill Hurf returns from the city to which he had fled when the feud began. Betty is again seen at the Tyler still which causes a quarrel between Bob and his father. Bob's brother Ed prevents a fight and Betty leaves threatening the old man. Bill Hurf comes up and old Tyler refuses to shake hands with a coward. Bill seizes a club and the old man, throwing his gun aside, fights with his hands. Bill picks up the gun and shoots the old man. Bob finds his father dead and, thinking that Betty has done the deed, writes a hasty note claiming that she killed his father in a quarrel and pins it to the body but the wind carries it away and Betty finds it.

Ed Tyler returns and jumps at the conclusion that the feud is on again; he, however, finds the part of a broken lead pencil, the only clue to the killing, and he flees for aid. Betty tells her father that of course the Hurfs will be blamed. She is examining the revolver when Bill comes in; he shows such horror that Betty accuses him of the crime and he confesses, but binds his sister to swear to keep his secret. Bob is riding away when he hears the Tyler bell ringing an alarm and starts back to investigate. Obedient to Mountain law, two small armies assemble, one at the Tyler home and the other at the home of Tom Hurf. The Tylers go to the still to rescue Jim's body. Betty comes hunting for Bob and is roughly treated. The Hurfs are just about to open fire when Botty shows Bob's note and the fury of the mob is transferred to Bob. The girl knows that if her lover is caught it means death. She mounts a wild colt and joins the chase. When it seems sure that Bob will be caught she leads the pursuers on the wrong track and Bob escapes.

A month passes, Bob and Betty long to see each other. One day Bob, walking to work in the city, hears Bill bargaining with the revenue officers to betray the location of the Tyler's still. Mounting his horse he swings back to the Mountains to warn his kinsmen. The officers and Bill Hurf take the train for the country seat and there demand the services of Joe Hurf, the sheriff, and he is compelled to take part in the raid. Arriving on the scene, Joe Hurf arrests Bob on the charge of killing his father. At the trial Bill Hurf sits opposite Ed Tyler. Bill is terrified and scribbles a note to Betty to remember her oath. Ed sees the pencil and recognizes it as the half of the one he had found near old Tyler's body, he accuses Bill, who confesses. The two families turn their anger on Bill Hurf and, congratulating Bob and Betty, the feud is ended for good.

THE WOLF'S DAUGHTER (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 29).—Edward Clark, under the name of John Bright, is posing as an oil and mining stock broker in an eastern city. Clark is a clever swindler. His misuse of the mails attracts the notice of the U. S. Secret Service. Two detectives are sent to arrest Clark, but the latter cleverly slips through the net and boards a train for the west. Clark lands in a western city, where his daughter Dora is in a convent. The girl, left motherless at an early age, has since lived and studied in the cloister. She knows nothing of her father's knavery, supposing him to be a prominent financier. In the same city live the Right Rev. James Nolan, a Catholic bishop, and his nephew, Clarence Nolan, a lad just twenty-one years old. Clarence is in love with both Dora Clark and Effie Ryan, the latter a daughter of an attorney, but the boy cannot decide which girl he loves the better. On the day of Clark's arrival Clarence, being of age, is given control of $50,000 left him from his dead father's estate. Clark, entering the city under his own name, takes Dora from the convent and they settle in a small apartment. Clark learns of Clarence's small fortune and that his daughter knows the boy well. He expresses a wish to meet the young man, and Dora, delighted, introduces her father to the bishop, Ryan and Clarence. After a short and pleasant acquaintance, Clark induces Clarence to become a partner with him (Clark) in a gilt-edged investment company, the boy to use his $50,000 as part of the capital. Clarence assents, using the name of the bishop's nephew in circulars proves a fine bait and many depositors leave their money in Clarence and Clark's office. Clarence handles all the money. Two weeks pass and Clarence decides he will ask Effie to marry him. Dora accidentally witnesses the proposal and returns to her apartment broken-hearted. At the same time Clark performs his usual stunt of rifling the company's safe, and, getting the crushed Dora, he takes her for a ride in the country in an auto. Next morning the embezzlement is discovered. A wild mob attacks Clarence. He seeks and finds refuge in the cathedral, where his uncle is saying mass. Meanwhile Dora is horrified when, far out in the country, she discovers that her father has swindled Clarence. The girl gives her father the slip and drives back to the city with the money, which she returns to Clarence. Later Clark is arrested in the East and Dora finds peace in the convent as a nun.

THUMB PRINTS AND DIAMONDS (Oct. 30).—Daniel Storm, a millionaire diamond collector, purchases a famous gem. Dick Turner, a crook, reads of the purchase in the papers, and, with his pal, Bob, plans a robbery. Turner visits Storm with a forged letter of introduction, and is welcomed by the millionaire because of his knowledge of diamonds. He is asked to stay at the mansion as a guest. Turner meets and is strongly attracted to Helen, Storm's daughter, who is in love with Frank Lewis, a private detective in Storm's employ, who occupies a front room in the house. Frank suspects Turner, but Storm refuses to take warning. Turner plans to rob the safe and throw suspicion on Frank. He has obtained a print from Frank's thumb, and having once been a counterfeiter, engraves a plaster dublicate. He phones Bob to be outside the library window to receive the jewels, but in the midst of the robbery Frank surprises Turner and covers him with a revolver. Bob steals through the window and overcomes Frank. He and Turner carry Frank to a vacant house nearby, where the detective is tied up and Turner returns to the library. He impresses the print of the plaster thumb on the diamond tray and leaves the contents of the safe in disorder. Then he returns to his room. Next morning the robbery is discovered and, by means of the print, Turner directs suspicion upon Frank. From the window of the vacant house Frank can see the porch of Storm's house and also Helen's window. Turner proposes to Helen on the porch, but she refuses. Her father favors his suit. Later, when Turner is pressing his attentions upon Helen, he drops the plaster thumb. Helen finds it, and realizes the truth. Turner discovers his loss, and returns to find Helen with it. He attempts to take it from her, but she escapes with it to her room. Turner breaks in the door. Frank sees their struggle from the window of the vacant house. He manages to free himself, and drops from the window. Storm, who has heard Helen's screams, comes into the room and grapples with Turner. The crook manages to throw him off, and escapes by the window just as Frank climbs to the porch roof. They struggle at the edge until Helen, coming to his assistance, strikes Turner with a flower pot. He releases Frank and topples from the roof to the ground. Helen, Frank and Storm descend and find Turner dead. Bob is captured with the stolen gems, and Storm bestows his blessings upon Frank and Helen.

AN INTERRUPTED NAP (Oct. 31).—Poor old Sim is worn out by the heat of the day and tries to get a nap in the big chair, but a gay wasp in full dress charges at his bald spot. Sim jumps up and fights the enemy with chairs, vases and anything that is handy for attack. The wasp is too fly to be hit and gives Sim the laugh at every onset. To soothe his nerves he tries to play the piano with hands, feet and face, but fails to derive any melodious comfort. Driven to frenzy, he calls his man and, in his rage, swallows him up; he becomes delirious and is attacked by a diminutive marble Apollo who bests him at every turn. Crazed beyond measure, Sim hurls himself through the third story window of the house opposite, there to escape his tormentors. He wakes up and is seen posting Lubin bills.

THE SOUBRETTE AND THE SIMP (Oct. 31).—Fred, a cowboy, considered the simp of the ranch, receives his three months' salary and goes to town to have a good time. He learns of a western melodrama "Dead Shot Nell," to be played at the theater that night and takes a party of rough-neck cowboys to see the show. The show is rotten, the boys are about to leave when the soubrette puts in her appearance. Fred immediately becomes infatuated with her; she sings "Come and Kiss Me." Fred takes the song seriously, jumps upon the stage and handles Nell very roughly. The stage hands overhear the row and throw Fred out of the theater.

Next morning Fred, believing that persistency wins, goes to see them off and the manager, finding that he hasn't enough money to "float" the company, sells Fred a half interest for five hundred dollars. He gets him the leading part in the show, along with carrying the trunks for the company. His five hundred is used up in a very short time and the manager decides to get rid of the Simp. This is more than Fred can stand. He beats a quick retreat to the railroad track where it is his intention to commit suicide and lays his head on the track, but, hearing the approaching train, he quickly changes his mind, and jumps aside to see the flying train go by and swears that he will never go and see a "gol darn" show any more.

BIOGRAPH.

THEIR SOLDIER BOY (Oct. 19).—Patriotism is a noble sentiment, but for every man who goes to the front there is some woman, some girl, who must experience the agonies of waiting for the news that never comes. The young clerk volunteers at his country's call, notwithstanding that he must leave mother and sweetheart behind. What happens after his departure is the subject of a tense drama.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 20).—Disinherited by his grandfather for engaging himself to Mary Graham without his consent, Martin Chuzzlewit is spurned by his uncle, Anthony Chuzzlewit, his cousin, Jonas, and the rest of his avaricious relatives. Mark Tapley, sweetheart of the widow Lupin, who keeps the Blue Dragon Inn, induces young Martin to go with him to America, where they will make their fortunes. Seth Pecksniff curries favor with old Martin, and Jonas Chuzzlewit, believing that Pecksniff will inherit the estate, strikes a bargain to marry Seth's daughter, Mercy. Anthony Chuzzlewit's health is bad, but he does not die soon enough to suit Jonas, so the latter poisons him. How the crime was fastened upon Jonas, and how young Martin came back from America to win his grandfather's favor and the hand of Mary Graham, are the closing scenes of this drama.

THEY CALLED IT BABY (Oct. 22).—An Indian brave is to marry the chief's daughter, and a dog is required for the wedding feast. Mabel and Dolly are playing with "Baby," a lap dog, when an Indian seizes the darling and makes off with it. The girls raise an outcry: "The Indians have stolen our Baby!" The police attack the Indian camp, and after a very funny series of battle scenes the girls rescue their pet, whereupon the men exclaim in disgust: "So that's Baby!"

HIS LOVING SPOUSE (Oct. 22).—Murphy's wife is a tartar, and to get even with her he buys a dummy from a gymnasium and sets it up in the yard to practise boxing upon it. To heighten the effect, he dresses the figure in some of his wife's clothes. During his absence she takes the place of the dummy, which apparently comes to life.

A WOMAN'S FOLLY (Oct. 23).—To enhance her social position, a young widow poses as an unmarried woman and marries a man with whom she falls genuinely in love. Lacking courage to disclose her secret, she pays clandestine visits to her boy, whom she has left in care of an aunt. The consequences of her deceit, unforseen and therefore doubly alarming, are dramatically developed.

THE BROKEN ROSE (Oct. 24).—Two boys whose characters are unmistakably shown in the earlier scenes of this picture, develop into men of widely differing natures. When a girl comes into the life of each, bringing to the one a new nobility, to the other a baser impulse, the conflict of their natures, which has been so long in developing, at last reaches a climax.

THE WALL OF FLAME (Oct. 29).—Bob Mayhew is a forest ranger and occupies the same camp with Rangers Fenton and Harlow. He is in love with Agnes, the daughter of Fenton. He has a rival in the person of Geo. Harlow, the third ranger living at the camp. Harlow is discharged for drunkenness and leaves.

The next day Bob and the girl's father are summoned to fight a distant fire. They leave the girl in charge of the cabin. Harlow, in a spirit of revenge, lights a fire which is carried by the wind in the direction of the cabins, thinking in this way to avenge his wrongs at the hands of the two other rangers. Later, however, he is trapped between the two fires, and having fallen from his horse and broken his leg, is unable to escape his just punishment. The girl flees before the encroaching flames, but becomes bewildered by the smoke and flame. She is about to be overcome when Bob returns and in a daring manner effects her rescue.

WHEN BESS GOT IN WRONG (Oct. 30).—Bess just can't help flirting. This makes Lee sore. Wherever he takes her, it's the same old story—she flirts and they quarrel. The climax came when he takes her to a party. She had promised she would not flirt with a soul, but what's the use. She and Lee quarrel and are parted. To spite Lee Bess lets three boys promise to take her home, neither boy knowing the other's intention. They learn of the racket, however, and inform Lee. They fix it so Bess hasn't an escort home. Lee even deserts her.

Bess refuses to let the butler accompany her home, as the hostess suggests, and starts out alone. On her way she is spoken to by a young dude and only by the timely appearance of a working man, is she saved from further annoyance. The workingman accompanies her to her corner.

Meanwhile Lee has taken the other girl home. Feeling he has done wrong, he hurries to overtake Bess before she reaches home. Almost there, he sees her approaching. She is in no forgiving mood. The honest workingman, stopping at the corner to light his pipe, glances back. He sees what he supposes is another dude accosting the young lady. Quickly reaching her side, he downs Lee. Bess screams and explains matters. Bess, now repentant, goes on home with Lee. At the gate, they patch up all differences and start out to live more happily.

THE WAY OF LIFE (Oct. 16).—Bob finishes his term in the penitentiary and decides to be an honest man. He looks up his sweetheart, Nell. He finds her with two crooks, "Count" Rocci and Red Leary. He begs her come with him. She promises the crooks she will aid them pull off just one more trick. Mrs. Hermuth, a society woman, is to wear a costly blue diamond at her reception. Nell is given the position of maid in the house. On the night of the ball Rocci drugs the hostess. Nell steals the diamond and gives it to Rocci. Red, waiting outside to receive the jewel, is arrested. Bob is prowling around the house, worrying about Nell. Rocci gives him the jewel, believing he is Red.

Red is given the third degree and confesses everything. Meantime, Nell has returned to her room. Bob telephones her he has the jewel, and will give it to her if she will return it to its owner. Nell consents. A detective arrives and arrests her. Bob arrives and has a fight with the detective. Bob is killed and Nell and Rocci go to jail.

THE FUNNY MR. DINGLE (Oct. 16).—May Maynard's father desired her to marry his old friend, Mr. Dingle. May finds Mr. Dingle obnoxious to her; she loves Roy Henley. Because of her father Roy is under the necessity to use strategy to secure a tete-a-tete with May. May's mother favors the match and assists in bringing about these meetings. This results in many stormy scenes between father and mother.

Mr. Dingle induces May to go sailing with him. The boat is capsized. Instead of Dingle proving himself the hero he painted himself to be, he makes for land, without a thought of his companion's rescue. Roy, who has seen the accident, boards another boat and arrives in time to save his sweetheart from a watery grave. This brings about the hurried marriage, on the dock, of the two young people in their wet and bedraggled condition.

Meantime, Dingle reaches safety, only to be thrown back into the water by May's mother after she has learned of his cowardice. May's father forgives and offers his blessing.

THE SENATOR'S LADY (Oct. 30).—The senator's wife, at his solicitation, goes to Washington to attend a notable function. The senator, during his residence in Washington, has been carrying on an affair with an empty headed society butterfly. On the night of the function the senator and his wife are introduced and the former is decidedly embarrassed with his wife's appearance. He is approached by the society butterfly, who has found a way to his heart. Realizing his position he does not greet her with his accustomed ardor. Hurt at this, she denounces his funny wife. The senator's wife happens to overhear part of their conversation and is deeply wounded. Her fighting blood is aroused. The senator leaves early with his wife.

The butterfly remains at the function. She writes him a note, which she sends by special messenger stating she is willing to let bygones be by-gones and offering him her deepest sympathy, also promising to overlook the affair if he will immediately come to her apartments. The senator receives her note and realizing the great difference in his position and that of his wife is moved to accept the proposal. He is on the point of leaving when he comes across the little bonnet his wife wore that evening to the society gathering. At first it excites his disgust, but suddenly a light breaks upon his clouded vision. He removes his hat and coat and again sits before the fire meditating. Then the full horror of his conduct begins to dawn upon him. A picture of his former life and the all-encompassing devotion of the wife he has scorned passes through the troubled mind of the man. He recalls her slaving life of drudgery all for his sake, utterly unselfish in its self-sacrifice. His campaign and final success; his judgeship—all made possible through her.

Awaking from his reverie, he sees the wife he has despised come from the chamber dressed to leave. She goes to the table and placed upon her head the plain little bonnet. She turns to him her tear-stained face and extends her arms in mute appeal. Aroused at last he takes her in his arms and swears she is all in all to him.

BISON.

A DAUGHTER OF THE REDSKINS (Two Parts Oct. 31).—Wanana, an Indian maiden, is admired by Kawana, the son of the chief of her tribe. Wanana is indifferent to Kawana's attentions. One day, while getting water from the spring, she meets Tomaka, the chief of another tribe. She immediately falls in love with him. Kawana becomes persistent in his demand for Wanana and threatens to drive her and her father from the tribe unless she consents to become his squaw.

Wana remains obdurate and the next day she and her father are driven out. On the mountain trail they meet Nomana, an Indian sorceress, who shows Wanana a vision of her rivals in deathly combat, in which Tomaka is victorious. They come to the great King River where they pitch their tepee.

When Wanana's father goes on a hunting trip he sends his daughter to pick some berries along the river bank. During their absence, Tomaka, who has been hunting, discovers their tepee. He again meets Wanana and they soon plight their troth. Tomaka returns to his people in anticipation of soon returning to claim Wanana as his squaw. Her father, in the meantime, has unfortunately met some bandits. Fearing the Indian may disclose their hiding place, kill him.

Wanana, who has also been hunting, comes across the dead body of her father. Wanana in search of the old man, discovers Kawana standing over the corpse; she accuses him of the slaying. He denies this and tries to force Wanana to return with him to his people. She refuses and makes her escape to Tomaka's village, where she appeals to her lover to avenge the death of her father. To prove his love for the girl, Tomaka leads his fighting men in an attack against Kawana and his tribe. A bloody battle ensues in which Tomaka unites the two tribes and is proclaimed chief over all, with Kawana as his squaw.

THE STRIKE OF COALDALE (Oct. 28).—Joe Gregory, a young engineer on the Coaldale Railroad, is the recognized leader among his fellow employees and a power in the local labor union. Conditions on the road become bad; a strike is imminent. Edith Harland, daughter of the president of the line, notes how things are going and pleads with Gregory to use his influence to avert the impending strike. Harland a proud and autocratic man, refuses to grant the demands of the trainmen and, despite Edith's pleading, the strike is declared.

Fights among the strikers and strikebreakers which Harland has hired occur. The situation becomes dangerous. While matters are progressing thus, Harland's daughter becomes seriously ill with concussion of the brain. She must be taken to a hospital at once and not a train on the line is running. The now frantic president pleads with the strikers to drive a train to the nearest hospital, fifty miles away. At this point Gregory interferes and points out to the men that a human life is at stake and they must not be branded as murderers. In the face of opposition, Gregory takes a train out. The strikers set fire to a trestle which they must cross, and in the face of almost certain death Gregory drives the trail through the flames.

Harland and his daughter Edith feel strongly grateful to the young engineer; but through his act of human kindness he is repudiated by the union and is placed in the position of being on neither one side or the other. The strike is kept and the men manage to capture Harland. The president's life is in danger of being forfeited. Gregory, in a masterful appeal, gains his former standing among the strikers and saves the president from violence. Together with Edith the young fellow pleads the men's cause, and Harland, his eyes at last being open, grants the demand of the men. In gratitude to Gregory, he is promoted to superintendent of the Coaldale Railroad, while we are led to believe that the friendship of Edith and Gregory has ripened into a happy romance.

THE MYSTERY OF GRAYSON HALL (Nov. 1).—Howard Grayson, a retired chemist, lives happily with his ward, Edna. He receives a letter from his nephew, a wild young fellow, stating that he is returning to his uncle, empty in pocket. Shortly afterwards, Ralph Forbes, the scapegrace nephew, arrives and falls violently in love with Edna.

She has given her heart to Jack Hall, Grayson's secretary. Ralph's bold advances are met coldly by the girl. Seeing the way things are going, the old chemist warns his nephew that unless he leads a better life he will cut him off without a penny. Fearing that the threat of his uncle will be made good, the evil-minded nephew decides to prevent it. Awaiting for an opportunity his criminal mind concocts a scheme whereby he will have his uncle die mysteriously. Shortly before his death, the chemist makes his will in favor of Edna, cutting off his nephew with a dollar.

Foxhall Keene, a noted detective, is summoned to investigate the mystery. By wonderful powers of deduction Keene fastens the suspision upon the nephew. Meanwhile, Ralph, while searching his uncle's possessions for his will, finds money enough for his flight and is almost to make his escape when the detective accuses him. In the presence of the lawyer, the chemist and Jack, Keene forces from the unfortunate Ralph a confession.

JOKER.

MR. NOAD'S ADLESS DAY (Oct. 28).—Mr. Noad, on leaving his house in the morning, is astonished to find posters disfiguring his fence. On arriving at his machine, he finds that some enterprising man has draped the back of it with an election sign. His progress is stopped on the way to the office by a man who wishes to discuss the merits of "Bingo, Death to Fleas," and his office door is found covered with various circulars, depicting the merits of goods to be had. After several interviews with publicity men and advertising agents, he is thoroughly disgusted and fatigued and his head sinks wearily on his desk and he dreams.

His Santanic Majesty appears to Mr. Noad and informs him that any one wish he may have will be granted. Noad promptly wishes that there be no advertising in the world. Satan smiles maliciously and grants the wish.

Still dreaming, Noad sees himself sent out the next morning to get some breakfast cereal. He is astonished to see no bill boards; a street car whizzes by signless. He can find no store with either the firm name or the label of the kind of wares they handle. When he finally lands in a grocery store he observes that the cans and packages are not labeled, as it would be advertising to put any names on them. When he gets to his office he gets mixed up in locating his room; all the familiar names have been removed from the doors. Many other humorous incidents happen to convince Mr. Noad that advertising, after all, has its advantages. Satan appears to him again. Noad makes a vicious "swat" at him; he falls to the floor.

Noad awakens and realizes it has all been a dream. He starts home. He greets the signs affectionately and recognizes his particular brand of perfecto by the band and the advertisement on the box. Arriving home, he greets his wife warmly, and all ends happily.

WHEN THEIR WIVES JOINED THE REGIMENT (Oct. 24).—Mrs. Groan and Mrs. Grundy are militant "suffragettes." Their husbands' lives are filled with woes. Man was never made to wash clothes, cook or attend to babies, as did Groan and Grundy.

But Groan and Grundy at last got their innings. As officers of the militia they were ordered to report to their regiment for duty. Before leaving they made the most out of the reversed situation by gleefully telling their wives that "it takes a man, and a man only, to be a soldier." With determination the wives schemed to show the shrimps that women, as well as men could be soldiers. They enlisted in the militia, disguised as men. They were assigned to the same regiment that their hubby's command. Groan and Grundy discover their deception. They decided to teach their wives a lesson. They kept the matter a secret and enjoyed the discomfiture of their wives as the latter were put through the various back-breaking drills required of recruits.

Finally the wives rebelled. They were promptly punished by being made to wash and cook for the regiment. This deal was too much. Completely broken and in full appreciation of a woman's duties to her home and husband, they deserted. Later, their husbands were made to acknowledge that, as housekeepers, their wives now had no equals.

THE PADRONE'S WARD (Two Parts—Oct. 16).—An Italian girl living in the heart of the East Side, supporting her guardian by peddling plaster casts made by a cripple who lives in the same cheaply furnished apartment with them. The girl is abused and starved. All the while the cripple looks on with sorrowing eyes, afraid to raise his hand in protest. The cripple loves the girl and attempts to tell her so. She repulses him. The padrone, the girl's guardian, is the leader of a gang of thieves and blackmailers. He rules with an iron hand. The cripple, against his inclination, is a member of this gang, and is forced to to the padrone's bidding.

The little Italian girl, sick, through abuse and lack of food, sinks, fainting to the street, while making her daily rounds. An Italian-American banker, passing in his automobile, observes her. Taking her into his machine he drives to her home. The money he leaves for her care is appropriated by the padrone. The banker calls often. The girl soon recovers.

This banker has been a victim of the Black Hand Society. He refuses to respond to the threatening letters and seeks the aid of the protective association. Plain clothes men are put on the case. The blackmailers determine his death. In drawing cuts, the cripple picks the unlucky number, which appoints him as the one to commit the murder. He attempts to carry the bidding out, but fails at the last moment. His love triumphs. He warns the girl of her sweetheart's danger. The girl seeks to warn the banker. The banker escapes death. The blackmailers are captured and sent to prison.

THE PERSISTENT LOVERS (Oct. 27).—Burke and Opp are both persistent suitors for the hand of Vivian. Burke opens a letter sent to Opp which declares the latter to be the heir of his late uncle. Burke writes a false letter inserting a proviso that Opp must not marry for two years in order to inherit his uncle's large fortune. This he substitutes for the original letter. Opp receives it and immediately ceases his attentions to Vivian. He carelessly drops the first page of the letter telling only of the fact that he has inherited $100,000 and Vivian and her mother discover it. They at once attempt to ensnare the newly rich Opp into marriage much to the discomfiture of Burke. They all go on a trip to Coney Island and have some side-splitting experiences on the roller-coasters and the chute-the-chutes. Vivian shakes Burke and clings to Opp. With Vivian's mother they go in bathing. While they are in the water Burke exchanges Opp's and mother's clothes in the bath-houses and they are forced to dress in each others garments and give chase to Burke. Opp drops the second sheet of the fake letter on which Burke has written the clause which stated that Opp would lose the fortune if he married. Much to Burke's joy Vivian switches her affections to him after reading the letter that Opp has dropped. Opp is left completely out in the cold until Vivian discovers the real letter which makes that young man heir without a string tied to the legacy. Then nothing remains to obstruct the course of true love. The scheming Burke then finds himself in the discard.

WHITE ROSES (Oct. 29).—The boy meets the charming little newsgirl and, feeling the impelling influence of Evil Thought, determines to see more of her. That evening the newsgirl, who has not yet been brought to harbor Evil Thought, trades the last of her wares for a beautiful white rose, which she takes home to her invalid mother. She is overcome with grief upon finding her mother has passed away in her absence and lies dead in her chair.

The boy, obeying the suggestion of Evil Thought, follows her to the tenement home. He pleads with her in an endeavor to get her to accept his attentions, not aware of the tragedy present. Overcome upon learning the truth, he leaves, only to be assailed again by Evil Thought, and persuaded to return. This time his plea is successful and the girl is about to give in, when her eyes fall upon the white rose she had bought for her Mother. She sees a vision of her mother pleading with her to keep herself pure; she turns the boy out of the place, her conscience having won the battle. She has stood the test of fire.

FRONTIER.

IN THE HOLLOW OF AN OAK (Oct. 18).—With the aid of a file, Joe makes his way to freedom.

Fred was too bashful to propose in person. He left a note for Dolly at their trysting place—an old oak tree—asking for her answer. Joe comes to this tree, climbs it to survey the country. Dolly puts in appearance, leaves a note for Fred and rides away. Joe comes down, discovers the note and reads it. He learns Dolly has decided to accept Fred, but has to go to town to obtain the pay roll for her father and will be unable to meet him until that afternoon. Joe decides the pay roll would come in handy. He writes another note and leaves it for Fred. When Fred reads this note, he learns his suit is hopeless. When he meets Dolly he gives her only a curt nod.

Fred decides to burn the note. He is about to do this when, on the other side of the note he discovers another message. He reads it and rushes to the sheriff's office, where the sheriff and his men find it is a note that was slipped in by Joe, accompanying the file. They conclude Joe substituted the note in order to throw Fred off the track. They ride after Dolly and find her struggling with Joe. He is captured. Fred, upon reading the original note, concludes life is worth living after all.

THE BLACKSMITH'S DAUGHTER (Oct. 31).—It was an accident that brought Fred and Lillian together. When a shoe came off his horse's foot Fred hastened to the blacksmith shop, and it was there that he met Lillian, the smith's daughter. Before he left she managed to slip into his pocket a horse shoe, the symbol of good luck.

Fred later finds the horse shoe. As is customary he hangs it over his door. Later he again comes to town and from the express office gets a package of money. Homeward bound, he sees Lillian about to enter her house. In an attempt to become better acquainted with her, Fred feigns illness. He is taken into her home, where mustard plasters and bitter bills fall to his lot. The package of money falls from his pocket. Lillian picks it up. He tells her to keep it until he is better.

Charlie, a ne'er do well, a friend of Jay, the blacksmith's assistant, eyes the money longingly. He confides to Jay about the ranchman's money and when an hour later, Fred has recovered and started back to his ranch, they go after him, Charlie with thoughts of the money, but Jay thinking only of beating up his rival. They arrive at the ranch and hold up Fred. But Fred has forgotten the money. Lillian rides after him with it. She hears angry voices in the ranch house. Peering in she sees Jay and Charlie viciously attacking Fred. Then the horse shoe over the door catches her eye. She snatches it up, dashes in the door and orders "Hand up." Taken off their guard, Jay and Charlie comply. They see through the ruse and turn again to Fred, only to find themselves covered with a six shooter.

IN SELF-DEFENSE (Two Parts—Oct. 29).—Charles Wright visited the mountain resort with his son. Here he met Mrs. Mary Horton, a handsome widow, and the meeting produced emotions long silent in the old hearts of both. To enliven the situation we find Fred, Wright's son a worthless young cub, falling in love with the daughter of Mrs. Horton. Vivian, for the sake of her brother, who is a fast friend of Fred's permits the attentions for a time.

About this time we are permitted an insight into the ways and life of Fred. His acts are contemptible—he possesses no morals to speak of. He even takes advantage of his position to gamble with and win a large sum of money from his friend, Phillip, Vivian's brother. The I. O. U. he secures is used to hold over the boy's head when the attentions to his sister are resented.

But Fred carries his attentions to the point of insult one evening. Phillip observes this and flies into a passion. There is a fight. Fred escapes in his canoe. Phillip follows in another and from where she stands, Vivian sees the two men fight in the water. Fred sinks. Phillip returns to his sister and, fearful of punishment, they decide to keep Fred's death a secret. When his son does not return, Mr. Wright employs a private detective from the city. The detective, Noble, arrives and is introduced as an old friend. Quietly he takes up the work of learning the whereabouts of the dead boy. He has the lake dragged. The body is brought up and in the clothing is found the I. O. U. slips, evidence that points to Phillip as the murderer.

Vivian, meantime, has been the companion, more or less, of the detective. It is not long before the young people find themselves in love. It is a trying situation for both Vivian and her brother, Phillip. However, Vivian is determined that Phillip shall not be captured and she takes steps to secure the evidence that has been secured against him. In order to accomplish this, she dresses in boy's clothes and, when the night is dark, starts out on her mission. She is shadowed by the detective who believes her a man, the real murderer of young Fred. Sneaking up behind her he fastens the handcuffs upon her. Then it is that he learns her identity and it is then that the girl, to protect her brother, assumes the guilt of killing Fred.

There follows a battle of emotions in the heart of the detective. Should he turn the girl loose in response to his heart, or should he do his duty and force her to stand trial? His love triumphs. He turns the girl loose, determined to never see her again.

Meantime, Phillip's innocence is proved by an eyewitness to the fight in the canoes. Phillip gives himself up, confident that the court will be lenient with him. At the end of the story Phillip is taken to the city for trial and we leave to the imagination of the spectators the final conclusion, suggesting to them, however, that older folks will marry and that Noble and Vivian will become reconciled.

GOLD SEAL.

TREY O' HEARTS (Thirteenth Installment—Oct. 27).—After repairing the punctured tire, the chauffeur drives on, the motor-car now containing Alan, Rose and Barcus in addition to Judith and Trine. But it has gone only a short distance when the chauffeur announces he can go no farther. The party prepares to camp for the night, but Rose has learned how Alan owes his life to Judith's defense of him when the motor-car overhauled the two in the desert, and furthermore intuitively divines the deepening interest in Judith which Alan is beginning to feel, but will not acknowledge even to himself. This, together with Judith's apparent contentment with the status of affairs renders the situation intolerable for Rose. She insists that they go on at all costs. Alan returns to the prospector and purchases from him his three burros. Upon these Alan, Rose and Barcus continue their flight through the remainder of the night. At dawn they come to a spot where a deep chasm is bridged only by a shaky affair of ropes. Out of sight of the suspension bridge they come upon the clearing and outbuildings that surround the shaft of an exhausted and abandoned copper mine. They decide to camp here for a few hours of sleep.

At dawn, Marrophat, Jimmy and Hicks (the two latter mounted on one horse) ride up to the stalled motor-car. Without rousing Judith, Trine, Marrophat and Jimmy confer. Trine urges them after Alan and Rose and it is agreed that Marrophat and Jimmie shall pursue. They do so, taking the two horses, leaving Hicks to care for Trine. Judith wakens later, and, finding Hicks in attendance, understands what has happened. In a rage, she starts off afoot after Marrophat and Jimmy haunted by visions of Alan being shot down by Marrophat. Alan's sleep is broken by a dream; he sees Judith toiling up the mountainside, afoot, with every indication of desperate haste; then he sees her looking at him steadfastly, her countenance expressing love and fear for him; as he looks, she draws a Trey of Hearts from her pocket and holds it out to him; it has "Danger!"

Alan wakes up, the dream still vivid in his mind. Alan leaves both Rose and Barcus asleep and goes out to reconnoiter. As Marrophat and Jimmy are passing the clearing of the mine, their attention is attracted by the braying of the tethered burros. They investigate, find Rose and Barcus asleep and bind and gag them, then scout about for Alan.

Arrived at the suspension bridge some time after, Marrophat and Jimmy have passed. Alan sees nothing to bear out the warning of his dream, but is struck by the idea of cutting down the bridge. Marrophat and Jimmy spy him from the bridge behind. Marrophat makes a flying leap to his shoulders, overcomes him and, with Jimmy's help, binds him. They then start back to the mine with Alan; for, be it known, Marrophat has conceived a hellish design.

From the foot of the mine shaft two tunnels strike off, one at a level slightly higher than the other. At the junction the powder room is situated. It contains a half-keg of blasting powder, a few sticks of dynamite, and some fuse. With Jimmy's assistance he lowers Alan, Rose and Barcus to the foot of the shaft, places them in the lower level, and shuts them in with the bulk head. Then he goes up and opens the sluice gate of the reservoir, diverting the water into the ladder shaft.

Meantime, Alan (who is not gagged) has with his teeth, worried loose the bonds about the wrists of Barcus; and the latter, his hands once more freed, has wasted no time in freeing Alan and Rose. Meanwhile, Jimmy has carelessly left a candle burning in the upper level. The candle burns down and drops its flaming wick into a pile of waste.

The waters mount rapidly in the lower level, backing up against the bulk-head. Alan and Barcus sustain Rose between them. They are in water to their chins, their heads against the roof of the tunnel.

The fire in the upper level ignites the fuse Marrophat has laid to the powder keg. The explosion follows. But instead of caving in the shaft, it blasts out the rock round the bulkhead and blows the latter in, letting the water out. Alan swarms up the bucket-rope hand over hand, then uses the windlass to draw, first Rose, then Barcus, to safety. Marrophat and Jimmy have mounted and ridden on. Meantime Judith has come to the suspension bridge. When she is in the middle, it falls away beneath her feet. She catches the hand rope, however, and, by its aid, gains the farther side. Then she hurries on, apprehending disaster and blaming the cutting of the ropes on Marrophat. She arrives at the clearing just as Alan and Barcus are assisting Rose to walk away from the shaft. Her unconcealed relief at seeing Alan safe and sound deepening Rose's distrust. She draws aside, first thoughtful, then jealous, then heart-broken.

THE POWER OF THE ANGELUS (Two Parts—Oct. 22). Don Gomez, a Spanish Grandee, his daughter, Mercedes, and her fiance, Juan Puyan, are seated at a table in the garden of Don Gomez's country home when a servant enters and announces the arrival of a stranger to see Don Gomez. Don Gomez goes into the house to meet the stranger, who proves to be Carlos Ferrara, who bears a letter from General Gonzales, an old friend of the Don's, asking the hospitality of the Don for Ferrara while he is touring Spain in the interests of the government. Carlos falls in love with Mercedes, whom he persuades to elope with him, thinking thus to gain possession of the Don's fortune. Juan and the Don learn of the elopement and follow Mercedes and Carlos to the Mission, arriving there just too late to prevent the marriage. The Don disowns his daughter. Juan, brokenhearted, becomes a monk. Carlos proves to have been an adventurer and his letter a forgery. Several years later Carlos, leader of a gang of bravos, runs a disreputable road house. A Mexican gardner in the monastery gardens overhears a conversation between the monks to the effect that the ship will arrive at sunset with the Sacred Chalice. The Mexican runs to inform Carlos, and Carlos plans to trail the monks and get the Chalice. Mercedes overhears the conversation and runs to the monastery to inform the monks of the plot. She finds Juan there as Father Superior.

Juan takes all his monks with him to protect the chalice and leaves Mercedes to ring the Angelus. It is interrupted by the ringing of the Angelus, to which all the Mexicans bow their heads in prayer. The father points out to the Mexicans their sin in defiling the Holy Chalice. Carlos urges them on, but they turn on him and tear him to pieces. The monks return to the monastery with the Chalice. The father finds Mercedes in sorrow, and when she asks his advice, saying she cannot return to Carlos, he tells her to carry her sorrow as he did to the foot of God's Holy Cross. Mercedes sobbingly kneels at the foot of the cross.

THE SPARK ETERNAL (Two Parts—Oct. 23).—Don McFadden, an East Side gunman and member of the Gopher gang, of which Schwartz is leader, is in love with Lola, a girl of his neighborhood. The Gopher gang gives a ball, which is broken up by a bunch of rival gangsters. In the fracas, Lola is shot through the shoulder and is taken to the hospiatl, where she is kindly treated by the nurse and Dr. Deering. Upon her recovery, the doctor's wife gives her a place as housemaid in their home. When Schwartz learns this, he compels Dan, as a member of the gang, to go to the doctor's house to rob it. Dan sends Lola a note, asking her to arrange to let him in, and stating his purpose in coming. She admits him. And then she tells Dan that she has done so, not to facilitate the theft, but to show him something. She leads him where he can see Dr. Deering, his wife and children, happily gathered about the evening fire. The doctor is reading to the children. A submerged chord in the young criminal's nature is roused, and he and Lola go to the priest's house where they are married.

THE GOLDEN GOOSE (Two Parts—Oct. 30).—Mrs. Colby, widow of a poor Arizona ranchman, her son, Tom, and baby daughter Edith, live on a poor ranch. Edith reads a great many fairy tales and believes in faries. One day while she is reading in the garden she indulges in incantations and follows instructions in the Fairy Tale book, asking the good fairy to appear to her. Ruth Hart, daughof the settlement banker, wanders into the garden and hears the child. She decides to play the Fairy for the little girl, and tells her she will grant her wish if it be good. Edith tells her how poor they are and wishes for a goose that will lay golden eggs. Ruth and Tom paint a goose and some eggs with gold paint and place same by the well, where Edith finds them.

The crops on the ranch fail and Banker Hart ejects the Colbys on the advice of his cashier, who wants to marry Ruth, and who tells Mr. Hart that Tom Colby is after Ruth for her money. Tom and his mother and Edith go into the hills, where Tom searches for gold. They are without food and have to kill the golden goose. In cleaning it Mrs. Colby finds what appears to be grains of gold in the gall of the goose. Tom goes to the place where the goose has been feeding and locates a rich strike. In the meantime Ruth discovers that Paul Goelet, the cashier, has lied to her father regarding Tom Colby, and insists upon his dismissal. Goelet, in revenge, starts a run on the bank. Tom happens along, stakes his golden Goose Mine against the integrity of the bank and thus averts disaster. Mr. Hart, recognizing Tom's worth, consents to his marriage with Ruth.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 40 (Oct. 19).—The day following the disappearance of Betty Hamilton's jewel, Ralph Hamilton determined to go to Margaret and demand that she return the stolen goods. If she would leave the neighborhood, he would promise not to pursue her further. Otherwise, he had no choice but to give her over to the authorities, for nobody wanted a female Raffles in the Westchester colony. But when he reached the house he found that Margaret and Aunt Abbie had gone to town on a shopping expedition, so he composed himself for a few hours' wait.

Meanwhile, Aunt Abbie and her niece were feasting their eyes on Simcox creations, and purchasing several of the very latest gowns of that internationally famous Fifth Avenue modiste, Also, they went up in the Flatiron Building, so that Auntie could look out over Madison Square, beautiful in the Indian summer sunshine, and enjoy her first panoramic vision of New York. When they reached home, a little after noon, Ralph was still sitting on the porch.

Aunt Abbie tactfully withdrew, and Ralph, irritated with long waiting, instantly demanded his sister's gem. He hinted at a dark alternative if Our Mutual Girl did not return it to him on the spot. But she was destined not to knew exactly what he had meant to do to her in that case, for just then, her visitor saw skulking in the bushes below the porch, a suspicious-looking man. The next instant Ralph had the fellow by the shoulder, and Margaret recognized Baby Lily's father.

Then, from the lips of the real thief, the whole story came out. The man had gone from bad to worse, and seemed somehow relieved to make a clean breast of it. Gradually, the remarkable tangle in which Margaret's foundling, Margaret herself, Ralph's own cousin, his sister, and this former chauffeur of his aunt's, whom he now remembered perfectly—all became clear to him.

Betty Hamilton was called on the phone and asked to come over at once. Then the four constituted themselves o board of strategy. They decided that if he would promise to go away and keep away, Baby Lily's father would be set free. Then Margaret and Betty arranged that Lily should become her aunt's ward. As for Ralph, he couldn't have been better pleased with the way the whole miserable affair of the suspected "female Raffles" had turned out. But Our Mutual Girl, while she confessed to herself a liking for this very troublesome young man, was determined in secret that he should not soon forget the part he had recently played.

A BLOTTED PAGE (Two Parts—Oct. 24).—This is a story of a wealthy man who, having lost all his money by careless handling, gambling, etc., returns to his home to end it all. His wife, unable to stand the disgrace, secures a divorce and goes to live with her rich father. When he returns to his home, he finds that the rooms are gradually being divested of furniture, and that there is only one servant to greet him, the parlor-maid. He tells her gruffly to leave him unmolested. She, however, being suspicious of his actions, returns to the library, and stops him from killing himself.

When he has become sane again, he asks her what right she has to interfere with him. She tells him the story of her life as an object lesson. Her husband, having lost all his first earnings in a mining proposition, committed suicide. Then her baby, which she was obliged to support, died. Feeling helpless and alone, she is about to kill herself when she is called back to earth by the pitiful wailing of a baby. Investigating, she enters the next room in the boarding house in which she lives, and finds the baby's mother has died of want. She then finds that there is something to live for, takes the baby and works for it. Not knowing anything else to do, she secures a position in his household as parlor maid and earned enough money to place the baby in a home to be cared for.

The man, after hearing this tale, is ashamed of himself. On asking her what mining company her husband lost his money, which was the cause of his death, he learns it is the company which belonged to his father and which had supported him in luxury all these years. With a new resolve to make up to her for the perfidy of his father, and for her interest in making a man of him, he resolves to work hard and help to give a future to the baby she has intended to bring up.

IN THE OPEN (Oct. 21).—In a covered wagon, drawn by a pair of scrawny horses, Sancho Mendez makes camp on the edge of a settler's homestead. Ben Carroll, the homesteader, riding that way to fetch the doctor for his sickly mother, finds Mendez abusing Conchita, his step-daughter. He defends the girl, knocks the Mexican bully down and takes her to his mother, warning Mendez not to molest her there. Carroll then continues on his errand.

Mrs. Carrol shows her visitor a box of old keepsakes and jewelry, and Mendez, who is lurking near, forces his way into the house, seizing the jewelry and compelling Conchita to return with him to the wagon. He is preparing to make a hasty departure when the girl catches sight of Carroll and the doctor approaching. Mendez threatens her with death if she makes an outcry, and she is obliged to get into the wagon and be driven away. In her desperation she sets fire to the wagon cover. As the flames leap up, Carroll and the doctor put spurs to their horses and gallop to the rescue. Mendez is disarmed and the jewelry recovered. He is given over to the sheriff. Carroll takes Conchita home with him again, realizing now that he loves her.

THE FINAL IMPULSE (Oct. 23).—Jack, the foreman's assistant, loves Marian, the foreman's daughter. She has become infatuated, however, with Woodley, a stranger recently arrived in the camp though he does not return her sentiment and seems to care for no one except little Helen, the blacksmith's child. One day a girl appears and demands to see Woodley. She has been deserted by him, and now, in an attempt to kill him in revenge, she is shot. The posse, led by Jack, pursues the stranger, who is at last cornered at one end of the trestle on the electric construction railroad. He starts an electric engine over the rails just as Jack and the men are crossing, so that they are in imminent danger of being swept to the rocks below. At this moment, Helen, the blacksmith's child who has been hiding in the work train, cries out. The stranger sees her going to her death. Woodley stops the engine, and saves the child—but at the cost of his own life.

SIR GALAHAD OF TWILIGHT (Two Parts—Oct. 26).—In a cabin high on Twilight Mountain lives old Louis Dorchet and his daughter Clotilde. Their only friend is big honest Jacques Lennaux, the trapper, who has watched Clotilde grow from childhood to womanhood and has come to love her. One day near a deserted camp Clotilde finds a picture. It is a copy of Watt's "Sir Galahad." She takes it home with her, but neither Jacques nor her father can tell her who the beautiful youth is. She pins it to the wall of the cabin. Near the Dorchet cabin is a high rock which Clotilde has named the place where the sun sets, and she makes a daily pilgrimage there to bid the sun "good-bye." Dorchet falls ill and on his bed calls Jacques to him. "Jacques, my friend, marry my little Clotilde that you may care for her." After the marriage the old man dies.

Several months later Jacques leaves Clotilde alone while he goes to the settlement to sell his furs. Two strangers come to Twilight, camping out. Dick Kenton and his friend Jim Martin. Clotilde sees Dick standing beside his horse as it drinks, and his pose is the pose of the man in the picture. He rides off without seeing her. The next day Jim meets her and attempts to kiss her. Dick rescues her and Jim slinks off. Dick and Clotilde become friends. She shows him the picture and he tells her that it is Galahad. She wants to know who that is and he takes from his pocket a copy of Sir Thomas Mallory's "Le Morte D'Arthur." "And when she saw Sir Galahad ride, she said God be with the best knight in the world." Clotilde clasps her hands, "That's you, you," she cries. He gives her the book. When he returns to his camp Jim has gone, leaving a note to the effect that should he stay they would surely come to blows over the "alluring Dryad." Jim makes him way to the settlement.

Jacques at the settlement has come upon Pedro, a half-breed, unmercifully beating his pony and has promptly given Pedro a sound thrashing in consequence. Jacques then enters the "hotel." Jim appears on the scene. In the bar he tells of Dick's conquest back on Twilight, a highly-colored account. Jacques fells him to the floor and strides out. He starts back home in his canoe. Jim bribes the willing Pedro to kill Jacques. Pedro makes a short cut on his horse and conceals himself at the spot on the stream where he knows Jacques will land. He springs upon Jacques.

Dick and Clotilde have come to love each other, though they have not voiced their love. Dick finds Jacques unconscious. He starts to assist him when the name on the handle of Jacques' hunting knife tells him who the man is that he is befriending. He starts to go away but his better nature asserts itself and he takes Jacques home. Clotilde tells Jacques when he recovers that he owes his life to Dick. Jacques broods over his wrong. He feels that the two young people love each other and, though his code of honor will not let him kill the man who saved his life, he determines to kill Clotilde rather than let her dishonor herself. Dick and Clotilde meet, he makes love to her but she tells him that to her he is Galahad and not to spoil her belief in him. She writes him a note later and slips out of the cabin with it. Jacques follows, his hand on his knife. She leaves the note in the crotch of a fallen tree and Jacques reads it: "Leave Twilight. You and I must never see each other again, for I love you, but I will never desert Jacques, dear, good Jacques, who would die for me."

The note and the words "Who would die for me," have a strange effect on Jacques. He decides what he will do. He leaves a note on Clotilde's pillow: "My little Clotilde, I go to the place where the sun sets. I have a fancy to sleep beneath the stars. Should you wake and miss me, you will find me there. Jacques."

At dawn the next morning, Dick, who is leaving Twilight, feeling it the honorable thing to do, comes upon Jacques lying at the foot of the great rock. He is still alive. Dick is horrified. Jacques begs "Be good to my little Clotilde" and he promises. Clotilde finds them there. Jacques lies like a gentleman he is, and says that he accidentally fell. He dies in her arms. Dick takes the sobbing girl to his breast.

SWEET AND LOW (Oct. 28).—Bryan Kyam, an old man, finds his way to a bench in a city park. He sits there thinking, sad and lonely. A little child, playing in the park, comes to him and, laying her little hand on his, looks up in his face, asking him what makes him so sad. He is startled and, looking up, beholds the little child before him. He starts as though to grab the child to him when he remembers that he has never seen this little one before. The touch of a baby hand brings back fond memories to his mind and with the child beside him he recalls pictures of the past.

The sweetest thing to him was the picture of the young mother over her babe, singing "Sweet and Low." They were all so happy in the little cottage, but Bryan, not satisfied, wished to give them more. He left for the West to the land of gold. There in that rough country he labored hard and always there come to him the words of "Sweet and Low." He was successful, but all too late. He received word that his wife had died. Broken hearted, he hurried home to find his baby, but she has been taken by a family and he is unable to locate them. He scours the country for the little one, but finally gives it up as hopeless. Through all the years he has been alone, happy only with the memories of the little mother. Finishing his story he sits, face in hands. The little child beside him climbs up and, putting her arms about his neck tries to comfort him and says, "'Sweet and Low, sweet and low,' Father will come to thee soon,' why that is what my mother sings."

Taking him by the hands she begs him to come with her. He goes with her to her home across the street, and upon the porch, where, looking through the large French windows, he sees a young mother with her babe, and hears the old, old song "Sweet and Low." He is overcome and falls to the floor. The young mother hearing the confusion on the porch rushes to the window and helps the old man in. She seats him in a large chair. He looks at her, takes her hand and searches her face for that which he has been looking for all these years. He has found his little girl at last.

ROYAL.

A BLACK HAND (Oct. 17).—Howard Melross, believing that his wife is untrue to him, wishes to die. He lacks the nerve to pull the trigger, so he tries to bribe the butler to do it. The butler, however, takes to his heels. And the maid, when called upon, also runs away. Melrose visits a Black Hand den, and upon the payment of a liberal sum of money, they agree to kill him before the last day of the month. Returning home, he finds that he has entirely misjudged his wife—so he changes his mind about dying. But, as he has paid the Black Hand to end his life, for the balance of the month he is kept busy dodging their repeated attempts to fulfill the contract.

HAROLD'S TOUPEE (Oct. 24).—Harold observes that his friend, Teddy, captivates all the girls. Teddy has a luxuriant head of hair, but Harold is afflicted with baldness. He reads up the hair advertisements, and then buys a bottle of every kind of hair restorer the druggist has in stock. But one of the tonics has an unspeakable odor which drives the hotel clerk and the pretty girls at the inn to Harold's room to "shoot that skunk." Harold escapes unseen, and determines to buy a toupee. The toupee, however, leads him a dance. It gets caught in a curtain over his head in a fashionable restaurant, and when he laughs, off it comes. The wind blows it down the street. A scamp runs off with it in Harold's hat and feeds it to a Nanny goat. It comes off when he goes in swimming. In short, every time Harold is anxious to make a special hit, the toupee cuts up some caper. Finally, however, he engaged in a delightful flirtation with a young lady of the right sort. This time he loses his toupee in a brook, but the mishap ends with winning him the girl.

THANHOUSER.

LEFT IN THE TRAIN (Oct. 18).—May Pollard defies her parents and elopes. After her husband's death she writes her father, begging him for the sake of her child, to forgive her. The old man is obdurate, however, despite the pleading of his wife. About this time, twin girls, distant cousins of May's, go to visit her parents. They notice a sad-eyed woman with a baby on the train. She gets off at a station called Grantwood, to send a telegram, missing the train, and the twins decide to adopt the baby. They manage to smuggle it off the cars in their lunchbasket. But when they reach Mr. and Mrs. Pollard's, the baby makes its presence known, and Mrs. Pollard telegraphs Grantwood station, where she relieves the distracted mother, telling her to come at once for the child. May veils herself heavily and comes, much to disappointment of the twins. Meanwhile, the grand father has lost his heart to the baby, and when, despite her disguise, he discovers the mother's identity, he forgives his daughter. Finding that the baby belongs in the family, the twins are partly reconciled to giving it up.

OLD JACKSON'S GIRL (Two Parts—Oct. 20).—Jim Jackson is suspected by the ranchers of the surrounding country of being a horse thief, but they are unable to secure evidence against him. His very pretty daughter, Beth, is much attracted to Bob Davis, a young "nester," but when he shows that he is interested in Ruth Camby, the daughter of a wealthy ranchman, her admiration cools. Camby tries to discourage the newcomer, and Davis finds when he opposes her father, refusing to dispose of his property to him, that Camby's daughter has no longer any use for him. He is reluctant, however, to renew his attentions to Beth, as she is crude, with very little education. Jackson is caught on Camby's land, and in the fight which ensues, Camby is killed. Jackson, vindictive toward Davis, manages to saddle him with the appearance of having committed the crime, and Camby's cowboys take the law into their hands. Beth overhears the plot and rides to Davis' cabin in time to warn him. When their ammunition is nearly exhausted, she, unknown to him, disguises herself in a suit of his clothes, and, running from the house, leaps on his horse and rides off down the trail, the posse in hot pursuit. She is wounded. But, meanwhile, her father has been captured by the sheriff. Fatally hurt, he clears Davis of the crime. And the young man then realizes that Beth is worth a dozen Ruth Cambys.

A Message from

William Fox to Exhibitors

"We are about to release four of the biggest dramatic successes in stage history. The titles of these plays are not only known to the theatre-going public but to the masses on the street as well.

"THE THIEF," "THE WALLS OF JERICHO," "THE CHILDREN OF THE GHETTO," and "LIFE'S SHOP WINDOW" are makers of dramatic history. They have always been high in public esteem.

"THE THIEF" is the success that held the boards for two years in Frohman's Lyceum Theatre, New York. Its career was remarkable and the S. R. O. sign was out every night of its run. It was the greatest triumph in the career of HENRI BERNSTEIN, the author. "DOROTHY DONNELLY," the creator of Madame X, will interpret for the screen the weak butterfly heroine, who steals from friends in order to get clothes and look pretty in the eyes of her husband.

"THE WALLS OF JERICHO," as produced by James K. Hackett, at Hackett's Theatre, New York, will make one of the most attractive drawing cards released this season. It has a long cast and even minor parts will be played by stars of the first magnitude. "EDMUND BREESE," that stalwart actor who made a national reputation in the part of John Ryder in The Lion and the Mouse, has been engaged to play Jack Frobisher in this famous Sutro military drama.

"THE CHILDREN OF THE GHETTO," ISRAEL ZANGWILL'S classic, that wonderful human story of those remarkable people who inhabit the slums of the big cities and who rise even above destiny to places of wealth and position, will be put on with stars that will stagger the picture fans with their brilliancy. Wilton Lackaye of Svengali fame will be one of stars in this masterpiece."

"LIFE'S SHOP WINDOW," one of the best known and most widely read "best sellers" and also one of the most discussed dramas, from the facile pen of VICTORIA CROSS, is now ready for release. This story will appeal to all classes. Every woman at some part of her life tarries at LIFE'S SHOP WINDOW and prices her toy. In this masterpiece is featured CLAIRE WHITNEY and STUART HOLMES.

These Productions will soon be available for booking. Keep in touch with our branches. Our regular customers will be given preference. Sign up before your competitors do so.

MR. CINDERELLA (Oct. 25).—Jimmy was called Mr. Cinderella because his life was just as unhappy as that of the poor little girl in the fairy tale. He lived with his step-mother and two bulky step-brothers whom the mother believed to be all that was fine and glorious in the world. The step-brothers did everything that they could to make Jimmy's daily lot miserable, and so worked upon their mother that when the country fair came round, he was made to stay home and chop wood, while they went to the fair and enjoyed themselves. Now Jimmy had a fairy god-father, a jovial old gentleman, who was always wandering along, smoking a cigar, and looking sharply at all the little boys he met. He pitied Jimmy, so he changed his ragged clothes into a brilliant uniform, and told a cigar to turn into an automobile, and Jimmy went off to the fair in great shape. There he met the Queen of the Popcorn Trust—and the rest of the story—well, it turns out just the way you would want it to.

MAJESTIC.

A MOTHER'S INFLUENCE (Oct. 27).—The son falls in love with his millionaire father's stenographer, against the parental wishes. To get rid of her influence over Wallace, Burton, Sr., discharges Madge. But the young man follows her and they are married. By so doing he separates himself from his father altogether. Some time later, while he is working as a mechanic, his wife is badly hurt in an accident, and he is told that she will be a cripple unless an expensive operation can be performed at once. Desperate, he determines to burglarize his father's house in order to get the needed money. While he is ransacking the library, two burglars break into the house. Wallace recalls his mother's words, "Thou shalt not steal!" and he attacks the thieves. The noise arouses the father, who reaches the scene in time to see the burglars put to flight by his son. When he learns the truth, a reconciliation follows. The operation on Madge is performed the next day.

PRINCESS.

THE TOUCH OF A LITTLE HAND (Oct. 16). The old pawnbroker's one passion in life is the accumulation of money. His clerk, Harry, is in love with Ruth, a factory girl, and when she becomes injured in an accident, the doctor advises a very expensive operation immediately. Ruth's widowed mother takes a necklace, which she has had for many years, to the pawnbroker's shop, hoping thus to secure the money for the operation. But it is discovered that her husband, a worthless man, had long ago sold the real jewels and substituted paste stones in their place. Harry, in despair at the prospect of his sweetheart's danger, makes the necessary loan upon the worthless security. When his employer discovers his act, the young clerk is arrested and imprisoned. His friends plead with the pawnbroker, but to no avail. At last, Ruth's little sister wakens in the tight-fisted old man a sympathetic chord. He pardons his clerk and brings health and happiness to the girl whom Harry loves.

ECLECTIC.

MAX'S FEET ARE PINCHED.—Poor Max! Invited to dine at the house of the girl whom he greatly admires, and on whom he desires to make an eminently good impression, he foolishly wears a newly-purchased pair of pumps, which, in his vanity, he has taken a size too small. Arriving at the lady's house he finds it almost impossible to smile and keep up his share of the merry talk and badinage. While at the dinner table he seizes the opportunity to shake off the shoe which pinches most and thus obtains relief from the torture. But a mischievous poodle finds the discarded shoe and then well, poor Max!

PICTURESQUE FRANCE—THE VALLEY OF JONTE (on Same Reel As Foregoing).—Charming views of a portion of France not much frequented by American travelers.

DOUBLES BRING TROUBLES.—The Hon. John F. Morton, candidate for a political office, has a twin brother James, who is his living image. James, who has been on a long journey, returns to his brother's house by cab from the railroad station and finds, to his surprise, that he lacks money to pay the cabman. Cabby straightway drives his fare to a bridge over a river and throws him in, bag and baggage. The bedraggled James retires to a wood, and, taking off his clothes, spreads them out to dry. While he is enjoying a nap a tramp seizes the opportunity to steal the clothes, leaving his own ragged garments in exchange. James then has to walk back to his brother's house clad only in a raincoat.

Finding no one home he enters the house by the back door and proceeds to clad himself in a suit of his brother's, which fits him perfectly. Thus resembling his brother more than ever, he straightway proceeds to get the Hon. John "in dutch," by getting mixed up in various altercations. The Hon. John's reputation has become, in a few short hours, very bad when the truth comes out before a police judge.

PRAIRIE DOGS (On Same Reel As Foregoing).—Intimate and interesting views of the quaint and attractive little animals of the western plains.

COLONEL HEEZA LIAR IN THE WILDERNESS.—In this offering the Colonel goes through some more of the startling experiences which have made him famous. Being left without a cook he captures a female chimpanzee which proves to be a very excellent substitute for the dark-hued cannibal lady who previously had presided over his kitchen. Miss Chimpanzee not only is an excellent cook but a talented musician as well. Unfortunately for the Colonel a gorilla comes a wooing her from the forest and the Colonel gets into an altercation with him. The gorilla is a fine fighter but the Colonel is a real white hope and puts his antagonist down and out for the count.

STRANGE ANIMALS (South America—On Same Reel as Foregoing).—Beautifully colored pictures of various remarkable animals little known to the majority of persons, among them the paca and armadillo.

WHEN HONOR CALLS (Four Parts).—Haskell Brown takes up the promotion of the "Golden Nugget" Mining Company, and staking his honor on the proposition advises all his friends to buy stock in it. One of them, Robert Truesdell, a wealthy manufacturer, not only invests heavily himself but recommends the purchase of the stock to his workmen. A flood of orders for the stock is the consequent result.

No sooner is the company successfully launched than Brown gives a reception to his friends who have invested in it. At the reception are Truesdell and George Thurston, the latter being the fiance of Marietta, Brown's daughter. At the height of the merriment Brown receives a cable from the manager of the mine to the effect that the mine shows a two million dollar deficit. Overwhelmed he retires to his room and kills himself. The next day Brown's house is mobbed by the angry workingmen who have lost their all. Truesdell stands by Marietta in her distress and promises to pay every cent the men have invested. Thurston deserts Marietta now penniless, and Truesdell takes the forlorn girl under his wing and later marries her.

Five years later the Truesdells are happy in their little home with the daughter that has been born to them. By dint of hard labor Truesdell has paid back every cent to the persons who invested in the defunct mine at his advice. Like a serpent there re-enters into their Eden Thurston, now returned from the far east. Seeing Marietta's beauty his old infatuation returns and he treacherously revives the old love in the girl's heart. She confesses this to her husband, and obtains a separation from him. Finding out too late the fickle nature of Thurston, and the broken hearts he has caused, she visits upon him a terrible vengeance which she expiates by a term in prison. To her, sick and hopeless, comes Truesdell and in his arms she finds forgiveness.

WORLD FILM CORP.

A GENTLEMAN FROM MISSISSIPPI (Brady—Five Parts).—William H. Langdon has been elected senator from Mississippi, and reaches the National capital with the experience in big politics that might be expected of a man who has lived his life on a plantation 40 miles from a railroad. With him are his two fair daughters, Carolina and Hope. He has scarcely reached his hotel when he hires "Bud" Haines, a newspaper man, as his secretary.

Charles Norton, representative from Mississippi, James Stevens, senior Senator, and Horatio Peabody, senator from Pennsylvania, are interested in a scheme to have a naval station located at Altacola, Miss., and they need the assistance of the new senator. They have purchased all the land in the neighborhood and plan to dispose of it to the government at their own price after the bill is put through. In order to insure his support Norton induces Langdon's son to invest $30,000 in Altacola and also puts in the fortune left the Senator's daughter by her mother. He is the girl's accepted suitor, by the way. Haines, in the meantime, has been a thorn in the side of the crooks, but by reporting to each that the other has played false and invested money in the land project, they bring about an estrangment between him and Langdon, which is set right by Hope Langdon telling Haines, with whom she is in love, of the plot. Langdon and Haines find they have been duped and the man from Mississippi decides to balk the thieves, even if it ruins his family. The story comes to a right ending by Langdon stepping into the Senate to make his maiden speech, denouncing the intended fraud, and declaring that he and the conspirators bought up the land to save the national treasury from being looted after having discovered a conspiracy in another quarter to commit the holdup. Before this important event he has compelled the two rascally senators to come to his way of thinking through fear of exposure. Congressman Norton is sent on his way in disgrace. Haines, again secretary, is engaged to wed Hope.

This is done and the sub-chief follows in an engine and Elaine and Davis in their machine. As the train, being driven by 413 at sixty miles an hour, reaches a bend near the signal tower, it shoots off into space and is wrecked after a drop of fifty feet down an embankment. They pull the body from the wreck, and find the smuggler chief was none other than Mr. Hall, Elaine's father, known as 413.

THE WIN(K)SOME WIDOW (Four Parts).—Business had been bad with "The Winsome Widow" musical comedy company and Cutey. The press agent was worrying how to keep the ghost walking when he read in the daily paper of the coming to New York of Miss Cissy FitzGerald, musical comedy star, with a famous wink. He contrived to meet Cissy before she landed. Persuaded her to join the company and changed the name to "The Win(k)some Widow" musical comedy company. Things are now considerable brighter, but Cissy's wink, which is world famous, plays havoc not only with the public, but with members of the company, including Cutey, Hughie, her manager, and Tosco, her orchestra leader, to say nothing of Gotrocks, a millionaire, and Jack, a wealthy club man. The show started on a prosperous run, Cissy tires of hotel life and rents a house. She invites her admirers for a house warming and they arrive, each bringing some animal as a pet, including a tame bear and a monkey.

Each admirer proposes and presents Cissy with a ring and some kind of animal. The next day she receives a 'phone call from her five admirers and suggests a quiet little supper after the show. Her husband, arriving before she can warn her expected guests, she is compelled to hide them. As they try to make their escape, their sudden appearances keep Cissy's heart on the jump, until Gotrocks, hiding in the fireplace, gets an idea from the soot on his face—sneaks a lambrequin from the mantel, wraps it around his head and is presented to Cissy's husband as her Hindoo servant. The other four get an idea from Gotrock's costume and appear in turn. Hughie as "her aunt from the country," Tosca as a chef, Jack as a maid of all work and Cutey, who is hiding in the piano, as a piano tuner. Tosca, as the chef, is ordered to cook a special dish for the husband. His efforts to make good causes the stove to pour forth a dense volume of smoke. Neighbors, thinking there is a fire, call the fire department who flood the house with water, giving Cissy's admirers opportunity to escape. Husband and wife are now left alone with the exception of the various pets, who are peacefully floating about with the real maid.

THE HOOSIER SCHOOLMASTER (Five Parts).—The story is laid in 1831 in rural Indiana then the western frontier of the United States. Ralph Hartsook drifts into Flat Creek District and before he leaves he demonstrates that "l'arnin'" is a keener edged tool than "lickin.." Before the arrival of the schoolmaster in Flat Creek, Hannah Thompson, a girl educated beyond her surroundings, sensitive and of a retiring disposition, had been bound out as a servant in the Means household. She he omes a drudge and a slave because she is not made of the stuff necessary to combat the brutality of the Means. Under the soiled clothes of the bound girl Ralph sees the "Queen rose of the rosebud garden of girls." Strong as her aversion is to education, Mrs. Means does not object to taking it into the family and she plans that Ralph marry her daughter. Where Ignorance errs Vanity is wise. She detests Ralph as a schoolmaster, but would boast of him as a son-in-law. The situation of Sis Means, egged on by her mother, playing for the favor of Ralph, and Ralph—his heart burning up for love of the bound girl—doing his best to maintain peace with the Means—gives rise to a sequence of the richest comedy.

From the day of his arrival the schoolmaster is looked upon as the natural enemy of the Flat Creek people. Bud Means is the champion schoolmaster-hater. He is six feet two inches tall and has "licked" every unfortunate schoolmaster who has ventured into the district.

Although rumors of the past and threats for the future bear him down, Ralph decides to stay and organize his "Church of the Licks."

When his pupils fail in their attempt to drive the schoolmaster out of the district the patriarchs undertake the job under the leadership of Pete Jones, a politician with influence in the community. The responsibility of a grave crime is fastened upon Ralph. Crowds gather and public sentiment runs high. Bud Means joined the "Church of the Best Licks" at the last moment and Pete Jones, by an unexpected turn of events, at his trial is branded as the guilty party. Shocky, Hannah's brother, is remembered in the end.

THE LONG ARM OF THE LAW (Four Parts).—"Bat" Henry, representing himself as the manager of the insurance company which indemnifies Mrs. George Warren against the loss of her famous jewels, is permitted in her presence to reappraise the jewels. Three men, flashing detectives' shields, brush by the startled servant. Grappling with Henry, they congratulate Mr. and Mrs. Warren upon their having been delivered from a clever crook. Prevailing upon them to allow the "detectives" to take the jewels with them to Police Headquarters pending their investigation of the theory that Warren's servants are leagued with the rogue, they drag Henry away. Safe in an automobile the four men laugh and exultantly examine the pearls so cleverly stolen. Cecil Douglas, an eccentric man of adventure, wagers $10,000 with a wealthy member of the club that he will produce the pearls within one week from midnight. Fellow members in the University Club draw up the agreement.

"Bat" Henry and a woman accomplice reading a newspaper learn that Countess Le May, famed for her precious stones, has bought a home in the suburbs. In another part of the paper they read an advertisement for a private secretary wanted by the same Countess Le May. Henry, applying for the job, is asked to write his name and address. The "Countess" enters the next room with the slip of paper. There, Douglass, who had engaged her for the part, compares the writing with that on the card presented to Mrs. Warren. It corresponds. But Henry, spying from within, had scented danger and when Douglass rushes in, the room is empty. After a stern chase, Douglass corners Henry and the woman. Covering both with his revolver, he demands the pearls. The woman presses the button. The section of floor under Douglass tilts forward and into a pit's depths he drops.

Setting fire to the flooring, Douglass is rescued by firemen. Using an aeroplane, he overtakes the fugitives' automobile. Attempting to enter their retreat he saws a circular hole through the door. But the crooks have heard the noise. Over the hand they slip a noose and strap it fast. Three shots from Douglass's revolver pierce the strap, setting him free. Over hill and dale again begins the pursuit. Exhausted, the woman sinks. But she hasn't got the pearls and Douglass throwing her aside runs doggedly on. Henry, close pressed, jumps into a barrel and rolls down a steep hill into the water. Douglass dives after him, subdues him and drags him and the satchel containing the pearls to the shore. A policeman takes the bedraggled crook in charge and Douglass hastens to the club, arriving just in time to win his wager.

THE ARROW'S TONGUE (Miller Bros. 101 Ranch—Two Parts).—The bright spring sun glittered on the silvery hair of an old man as he slowly plodded along in the wake of his plow. Suddenly his plow struck an obstacle. He stopped to remove it. It was a human skull. Brushing aside the surrounding soil he brought to light other human bones. Imbedded in them was an Indian arrow head. Memories of a half century back were awakened and the hands of time reversed. From out of the past came the hordes of ruthless redskins and the never ending stream of homeseekers from the East. And in his reverie was reenacted the legend of the "Arrow's Tongue." Here is the legend.

The fame of Sacashu the daughter of the Dacotah's, had spread far beyond the confines of her own nation. The Indian maiden had pledged her love to Wa-hu-ha.

But on an evil day her happiness was turned into despair. For a jug of rum her father Chief Black Horse, tore her from the arms of Wa-hu-ha and sold her to a cruel and heartless whiskey runner. Fifteen years elapsed. Sacahsu had led a hard life. A son has been born to her. He was now fourteen years of age.

At this time the old Chief Black Horse died and the silent, grim visaged Wa-hu-ha was elected head of his people. He led his braves to take revenge on the white race. Wa-hu-ha determined that the man who had stolen his betrothed should be his first sacrifice. He approached the cabin, and with a fiendish yell his braves burst into it. The whiskey runner fell a victim to the tomahawk. Sacashu grasped a gun to continue the battle when she recognized Wa-hu-ha. He clasped her to his breast.

The half-breed boy who was in the attic where the whiskey was stored hearing the struggles below, in his fright accidentally smashed a jug of whiskey. The yellow fluid trickled down between the chinks in the boards of the ceiling. A drop fell down upon the hand of Wa-hu-ha it was whiskey. He darted up the ladder followed by the rest. The Indians abandoned themselves to a drunken orgie. The boy crawled through the roof window and leaping from it, jumped upon his father's white pony and started off. Quick as a flash an arrow from Wa-hu-ha's bow flew through the air, struck the boy and buried its tip deep in his back. On dashed the frenzied steel, his dying rider clinging desperately—the fatal arrow waving its warning.

Wa-hu-ha, his savage nature thoroughly aroused by rum, set the cabin on fire and carried Sacashu away. She, thinking her boy still in the burning cabin pleaded with the chief to save him, but he was deaf to her appeal. The Indians in their blood lust attacked with fury a wagon train.

Sacashu, escaping from the Indians, seized a war club, mounted a horse and returned to her old home, now in ashes. Believing that her boy had perished in the flames, she swore vengeance on her former lover. Mounting the top of the hill, overlooking the circle of death surrounding the settlers, she sighted Wa-hu-ha. She crept stealthly up behind him, and with a stunning blow she wreaked a mother's vengeance. Sacashu then darted for the ranks of the white men for protection. Mistaking her for an enemy they shot her.

On the top of a knoll a government scout saw a flying boy mounted on a white horse and knew too well what it meant. Turning about he galloped to the fort. The troops were called to arms and dashed across the plain to the scene of the battle. The settlers fought with the fury of despair, but the savages were steadily circling closer. The white men were preparing to die when over the crest of a little hill the Stars and Stripes appeared. The battle raged between the soldiers and the Indians. The Redskins leaving the prairie strewn with their dead, retreated precipitately.

But far away the white horse sped onward, the dying boy and the fateful arrow spreading with silent eloquence their dread message. At last the rider fell lifeless to the ground. The Arrow's Tongue had spoken, as it spoke fifty years later to the old farmer whose plow turned it up with the whitened bones of Sacashu's son.

THE PRICE OF CRIME (Albuquerque—Three Parts).—Dorothea Vale found it hard to choose between two suitors—Jack Conway and Jack Livingston. She finally accepted Conway, and they made their home with his sweet old mother. For a time they lived happily. Conway became a trusted bank cashier and grew prosperous. Then he began to go the pace, and neglected his faithful wife for women of the world. Dorothea soon learned of her husband's escapades. She tried to win him back from his ruinous course, but without avail. So she devoted herself to his aged mother.

At last the inevitable happened. Conway was found short in his accounts by the bank examiner. He rushed to his home, hurriedly packed his grip, and while he delayed for a moment for his mother's caresses the detectives, who had followed him to the house, placed him under arrest. He was tried and sentenced to a long term in prison.

Dorothea kept the mother in ignorance of the true fate of her son, saying that he had gone on a journey in the interest of the bank and would not return for a long time. The bank seized everything of value which Conway had possessed and left his wife and mother in straitened circumstances; but the wife, on the verge of poverty, labored.

Conway at last managed to escape from prison and jumped on a train headed westward. After a long journey he leaped off the train, was hurt ,and picked up by a band of outlaws. When they satisfied themselves that he was not a spy they made him one of their number.

In the meantime his mother suffered a paralytic shock, and as a result lost her eyesight. The doctor advised a quick change of climate, and Dorothea decided to take the old lady up into the rugged hills of Colorado. It so happened that the train in which they traveled had a large shipment of gold aboard. The outlaw chief secured knowledge of this shipment and arranged to hold up the train.

The troupe of train robbers, including Conway, hid behind a little bluff, and the bandit chief's sister on horseback rode out to meet the train. Then she leaped from her saddle, caught the ladder of a box car next the engine, climbed to the top and made her way to the tender. Revolver in hand, she compelled the engineer to stop the train at the exact spot where her band was in hiding. The outlaws quickly surrounded the train and ordered the passengers out. Conway, being at the other end of the train, did not discover his wife and mother. The strong box was taken from the express car.

As they were galloping in haste back to their rendezvous they encountered a posse under command of Sheriff Buck Connors, who had been notified of the intended train robbery. Jack Conway was riding at the head of the flying outlaws. Suddenly his horse stumbled and fell. A dozen other horses fell over him. Conway was captured with many more of the outlaws. Lying in a blanket slung between two horses, he was taken toward the nearest town. On the way they passed the train, still at the scene of the hold-up. The blind mother, sitting in the grass with Dorothea, recognized in the cries of the wounded man her son's voice.

She called to him; he heard her, and asked to be taken to her. She folded him in her arms. He looked up into her unseeing eyes and breathed his last. The excitement of the meeting caused the old mother to suffer another stroke. She was removed to a little shanty close by, where she passed away, never knowing that her son had paid with his life the price of crime. Dorothea, pale and worn, looked out upon the mountain tops and wept.

HUNTED DOWN (U. S. Film Corp.—Three Parts).—The little Arizona town of Sagamon Center was just vibrating with excitement. It was election day. The main interest of the day was focused on the contest for the office of sheriff. Jack Davis and Tom Boyle were the two rival candidates. When the vote was counted Jack Davis was found the winner. Boyle was a bad loser. He determined to "get even," and the best way that occurred to him was to steal Jack's girl, Grace Stanford. The new sheriff hastened to his sweetheart to tell her of his victory. He was astounded when he found that she was about to elope with his defeated opponent. There was a struggle. Jack disarmed his treacherous enemy. Then, facing the girl, made her choose between them. She repented her foolish act, and, throwing herself into the arms of her finance, begged Boyle to go away forever. Jack forgave the fickle girl and they were married.

A year later, while the sheriff was at his wife's sick bed, a courier brought him word that Boyle and a band of lawless followers had raided the town. Reluctantly he left the sickroom and arrested his man. Taking Boyle to the Mexican border, Jack set him free. Returning he found his wife dead and a newborn daughter to claim his love.

Eighteen years passed. Sagamon Center had grown to be quite a town, but Jack Davis was still the sheriff. His daughter, Doris, had grown up to be the picture of her dead mother and was the pride of her father's heart. At this time Tom Boyle, still nursing his vow of revenge, returned to Sagamon Center under another name. Few of the younger generation had heard of him, and his former associates did not recognize him. Closely he observed the sheriff, with a view of finding how he could wreak his belated vengeance most effectively.

It was not long before he discovered he could strike his man the most telling blow through the beautiful Doris. He accordingly laid siege to Doris, and worked with fiendish fervor behind the unsuspecting father's back to get the girl completely under his influence. He succeeded. Then, a few months later, when she begged him to marry her, he spurned her. His revenge was accomplished. Confronted with the full realization of her plight, she saw but one way out—self-destruction.

Her father received a picture of a man who was wanted by the authorities of a neighboring county for murder. With the portrait he went home to await the assembling of his posse for the search. The face on the photograph was strangely familiar, yet he could not place it. He entered the house just as his daughter was about to shoot herself. He snatched the pistol from her hands. Her gaze fell upon the picture. She drew back with staring eyes. "That—that is the man," she cried. Davis forced the truth from her. Then he started after Boyle.

Far out among the rocks of Coyote Gulch he at last spied his man. The guilty wretch fled, with the outraged father like a human bloodhound following his trail relentlessly. Davis slowly gained upon him, and finally the fugitive found himself on the edge of a beetling cliff. His escape was shut off, he turned upon his pursuer, and with fiendish desperation fought for his life, using the big rocks for a shield. From boulder to boulder Davis crept closer to his quarry. Finally, as Boyle peered from behind a rock, Davis gave him his death wound.

Jack hastened to his side. Life was ebbing away. With the veil of eternity slowly enveloping him he repented of his misdeeds and pleaded that he be taken to Doris before it was too late. The sheriff carried the dying man to the village in a race with death to save his daughter's honor. Arrived there, a minister was quickly found, and with his last breath Tom Boyle made his atonement.

IN THE DUKE'S POWER (Roma—Three Parts).—For a crime of which he was falsely accused Peter Neillson was condemned to life imprisonment. The fight against poverty was too much for his poor wife. On her deathbed she implored an old friend, Antonio, to take her infant daughter, Marie, and bring her up. For twenty long years the convict plotted to burst his dungeon bars, to fly to his child and devote the remnant of his life to her. The moment at last arrived. He escaped and again entered the world.

With all speed he sought Antonio, only to be told that his daughter had run away years ago with a stranger. Antonio, however, introduced as his own daughter a young woman whose name was also Marie, and who was engaged to a worthy young man. The outcast looked with envious eyes upon the happy Antonio.

After vainly seeking employment, he at last applied at the castle of the young and dissolute Duke of Belnord. To him Peter confided all—his past, his escape and his present condition—and begged for a chance to redeem himself. The duke saw his opportunity. He had been attracted by Marie's beauty and longed to possess her. He accordingly took the convict into his confidence, and offered employment and safety in return for the trapping of Marie, Peter agreed to the Duke's terms.

A few days later he proceeded to carry out his part of the bargain. He told Marie that her fiance had been injured and taken to the castle, thus luring the unsuspecting girl into the Duke's power. When Peter left the castle he met Antonio, who had missed Marie and was anxious about her. The moment of Peter's revenge had come. "Your daughter," he said, "was not better than mine. She has suffered the same fate." He knew what Peter meant.

"What have you done?" cried Antonio. "I loved Marie too much to give her up. I lied to you. She is your daughter!"

Peter turned and dashed off toward the castle. He gained admittance, and asked for the duke. In frenzy, he explained his relationship to the girl, and demanded that she be liberated. The duke, with a shrug, ordered his lackeys to throw the convict out.

Returning to the castle, he climbed the wall by means of jutting rocks and reached the parapet. He heard cries for help coming from the window of a room far below. Securing a coil of rope he lowered himself down the side of the castle. He reached the window. Through the bars he beheld his child unconscious in the duke's power.

The latter rushed to the window and attacked the rescuer with a knife. Peter lost his hold of the rope and fell backward, but he had looped the rope around his foot and was saved. A moment he hung head downward. Then slowly he regained his hold and climbed back to the window. He aroused the girl from her stupor. "I am your father, Marie!" he cried. "Come away! Hurry!"

They hastened to the window. Marie, when she beheld the great distance to the ground, shrank back in fear. Her father forced her through the bars, and together they made their way down to safety.

When the duke returned and found the girl had gone, he resolved to deliver her convict father back to the law, and with a party of retainers started from the castle in quest of his man.

In the meantime Peter had taken the girl to Antonio's house. Then, receiving word of the duke's intention to betray him, he fled. At the edge of a high precipice he found himself in a trap. Looking back he saw his enemy approaching. Before he could escape Belnord was upon him.

There, with the abyss yawning beside them, they fought. Suddenly, with a harrowing cry, the duke fell backward. As he fell he clutched Peter, and together they went over the precipice.

Antonio, Marie and her lover, who had seen the struggle from a distance, rushed to where the men fell. The Duke of Belnord lay motionless in death. Peter was gasping pitifully for breath when Marie knelt beside him. With a last effort the dying man placed Marie's hand in her lover's.

THE DRIFT (Marion Leonard Players—Three Parts).—John Evans and Thomas Barnes were both employed by the banking house of H. M. Cruze & Co. They also occupied an apartment together. Barnes received a tip to play C. & S. stock for a rise. But instead of rising it fell, and he was notified by his broker to send five hundred dollars the next morning to cover the margin or be wiped out. He had no money of his own left, and waiting until every one had left the office, Barnes opened the safe and took out five hundred dollars.

Going home late he met Evans, who had been at a card party at the home of Marion Harley, a society leader. Evans said he lost all his money and asked for a loan so that he might return and retrieve his losses. Barnes gave his pal two hundred dollars, cautioning him to return it without fail. Evans hastened back to the house of Marion. The game was still in progress, and he plunged into it again. His luck continued against him, and his hostess won the money he had borrowed from his friend. Empty-handed he went home and told Barnes. The latter in frenzy deplored the loss and confessed that he had stolen it from the firm.

Evans returned to Marion and begged her to give him back the money. She refused. Then he told her that he had taken it from the firm himself and faced jail unless he returned it. The woman was about to return it when her mother warned her not to allow her sympathy to get the best of her reason. He left in despair. In the meanwhile Barnes had received a peremptory note from a creditor stating that unless the money due was paid by 10 o'clock the following morning the law would be resorted to. This was the last straw. Barnes took what was left of the five hundred dollars and fled.

Evans, returning late to the apartment after his unsatisfactory interview with Marion, found a burglar at work. There was a fierce fight, which ended in Evans knocking the thief senseless. He then started to call the police, but opening the door fell back before an inrushing volume of smoke. He tried to bring the prostrate burglar back to consciousness, but the advancing flames made him seek his own safety. As it was, he was only rescued by the firemen in the nick of time and taken to the hospital unconscious from smoke.

In the ruins the police found a charred body. It was unrecognizable, but the official conclusion was that Barnes had perished in the flames.

The next morning the banker discovered that the sum of five hundred dollars was missing from the safe. He notified the police, and an investigation was started. Marion, reading of the theft in the newspapers, sent word to the banker that Evans had confessed to her that he had stolen the money. He was arrested and convicted solely upon the testimony of Marion, in spite of his declaration that Barnes had taken the money. Barnes, hiding in a little summer resort, read the accounts of the fire, the finding of the charred body supposed to be himself, and the conviction of his friend for his crime. He felt that he was perfectly safe.

In the city the social season had ended, and Marion went to spend the summer with an aunt who lived in a little seaside village. It so happened that it was the same town in which Barnes was staying, who had assumed the name of Lewis, and Marion met, loved and married. Then they returned to the city to live. One day the two met the banker, who greeted Marion; Tom turned his face to escape recognition. When Marion remarked about this strange action, he declared that he did not know the banker.

From that time on Tom felt like a hunted man. One day Marion suddenly entered his room. He was absorbed in a newspaper clipping. When he saw her he sprang back in alarm. In answer to his wife's inquiries as to what the paper was, he answered that it was nothing of interest and tossed it into the open grate.

He abruptly left the room. She snatched the clipping out of the fireplace. It was an account of the supposed death of Barnes and the conviction of Evans, with a picture of a man who strongly resembled her husband. Marion took a photograph of her husband to the banker, who at once identified it as Tom Barnes. Marion recalled Evans' statement at his trial—that Barnes had stolen the money. Determined to do her duty as she saw it, Marion delivered up her husband to the law. Out he was led to pay the penalty of the life into which he had drifted.

THE BLAZING SEA (Danmark—Three Parts).—The Custom House at San Guilo was in a state of great excitement. It has received this message from headquarters:

"Just discovered that dynamite is being smuggled into the country through your district. Be on your guard. A reward of $1,000 is offered for the arrest of the smugglers."

The chief summoned a young secret service detective and placed the case in his hands. The detective went to the village and secured employment as a bartender in the inn as the first step toward obtaining a clue. Among the frequent visitors at the inn were Caspar and his pretty sister, Bess, who kept the San Guilo lighthouse, which stood a mile out at sea on a dangerous reef. Tom and Bess quickly became interested in each other, but he did not allow his growing love to interfere with his duties. He observed that his employer, the innkeeper, and the two people from the lighthouse often held long and serious conversations in low voice.

One day through his telescope the detective saw Caspar, Bess and the innkeeper transferring boxes from the lighthouse to a small boat. They then sailed across the bay to the Old Cape windmill. Tom approached the mill from another direction, and succeeded in verifying his suspicions. They were the smugglers.

A few minutes after he returned to the inn the trio entered. They did not remain long, however, but soon set out in Caspar's boat for the lighthouse. A little later Tom followed in a rowboat. Reaching the lighthouse, he peered into the window and saw the smugglers talking over their plans. He made a complete tour of inspection and had reached the top of the lighthouse when he beheld Bess standing at his side. She looked at him reproachfully. The detective was so engrossed in the presence of the woman he loved that he did not hear the two smugglers stealing up behind him. Before he could intervene they seized Bess and placed her on their craft. They set the detective's boat adrift, and with the girl as their prisoner sailed for the old windmill on the shore, leaving the secret service man marooned in the lighthouse. They intended to return and reckon with him later.

Left alone Tom began a search of the lighthouse. He found the cellar filled with smuggled dynamite. The next moment there came a shattering report, and in a short while clouds of smoke were pouring in upon him. Lightning had struck the big lighthouse and set it on fire. He turned to free himself, but the drap-door had sprung shut and he was imprisoned.

In the meanwhile the smugglers in their boat raced for the shore before the storm. Harshly accusing Bess of being a traitor, her brother locked her in the windmill and then hastened to the inn.

The storm raged fiercely. Bess looked out of the windmill and saw the lighthouse across the sea enveloped in a mass of flames and smoke. She stood appalled. She knew it would not take long for the flames to reach the dynamite. She determined to escape and go to Tom's rescue. She climbed up the rickety old ladder to the top of the mill, then crawled out on one of the fans. Slowly it turned under her weight, and when it reached the lowest point she dropped to freedom. As she sped for the shore the terrific wind caught the fans of the windmill and started them revolving at a rapid rate. This caused such great friction that the woodwork began to burn.

As she rowed through the rough water great flames leaped up from the burning lighthouse. Crowds of villagers gazed in fright upon the spectacular scene. The detective was almost overcome when Bess rescued him. When they were about half way to shore the flames reached the dynamite. The air was split with the report of a deafening explosion.

The smugglers, in the meantime, saw the windmill burning and rushed to rescue Bess and remove the dynamite. They found the girl gone. Seizing a box of dynamite Caspar tossed it outside. The explosion that resulted blew the door shut and piled a mass of rocks against it. The smugglers were trapped in the burning windmill.

Bess and her lover reached the shore in safety and were met by the shore police. Led by Tom, they hastened to the windmill. The imprisoned men were rescued, only to fall into the arms of the officers of the law

GENERAL FILM COMPANY.

GARRISON'S FINISH (Selig—Three Parts).—Billy Garrison, a successful young jockey, rides the favorite "Sis" in the Louisville derby. He does not ride with his customary vigor and dash. He feels "doped" and entirely out of condition and as a consequence "Sis," instead of winning the race, trails in last under the wire. At the stables he is accused of throwing the race, but denies it, stating that something was the matter with the horse and himself. He can only conjecture that the drinking water had been "doped" before the race. George Waterbury, owner of "Sis," rages over the loss of the race, which costs him a pot of money. In his anger he threatens to thrash Garrison, but Jim Drake, an honest, successful horseman and a good friend of Garrison, prevents Waterbury from carrying out his intentions. Drake does not believe Garrison to be guilty of throwing the race.

Garrison starts for the city heart-broken over the accusation. At the railroad station he interferes with a ruffian who is forcing his unwelcome attentions upon Sue Desha, daughter of a well known horseman, and thereby wins her favor, but their acquaintance is merely casual and neither expects to see the other again. Garrison enters a cafe, and there learns that the police are searching for him on the charge of poisoning the running horse, "Sis." Jim Drake enters the cafe, learns of his predicament, offers him money with which to leave the country and declares his friendship. Garrison refuses to go away and says he is determined to face the accusation.

Drake leaves the cafe and then Garrison overhears two men at an opposite table repeating in a loud voice the charges that Garrison had thrown the race. The little jockey becomes infuriated and knocks one of them down, but the other man strikes Garrison on the head with an empty wine bottle, knocking him to the floor senseless and bleeding. Garrison is taken to a hospital, unidentified and delirious. He remains in the hospital for several weeks and when his wounds have healed he recovers his physical strength, but his mind is a blank. He wanders about aimlessly until, while in swimming one day, an unscrupulous lawyer determines to profit by the similarity of a birthmark on the jockey's arm. A reward has been offered for information as to the whereabouts of a young man bearing a similar birthmark. Snark, the lawyer, determines to profit by what he thinks to be a coincidence, and in his weakened mental condition Garrison falls a victim to the wiles of Snarks and agrees to enter into the deception, so that Snarks will receive the reward.

Garrison is received into the family of Major Calvert as the missing nephew, William Dagget. Sue Desha visits the Calvert home, recognizes Billy, and they fall in love. But Billy's conscience bothers him and he decides to go away.

On his way back to the city the train is wrecked and he again receives a wound on the head. The shock of the railroad wreck has relieved a brain lesion, so that a piece of the skull which had been pressing upon the brain cells is released and the hospital surgeons remove it. Billy Garrison finds himself weak and emaciated, while the happy months spent by him in the beautiful home of Major Calvert are a blank. Jim Drake, his old-time friend, traces Garrison to the hospital and finds him there. He is overjoyed to find the young jockey recovering his health and arranges with him to ride the favorite "Speedway," of which he is owner, at the coming Carter Handicap. Strengthened by the knowledge that his friends are still loyal and heartened by the prospects of again entering into the racing game, Billy recovers rapidly and in a short time is able to leave the hospital.

In the meantime Wm. Dagget, a brother-in-law of Major Calvert, sends him word that his son, Billy, who disappeared some time ago, has been riding as a jockey under the name of Billy Garrison. The Major again makes every effort to discover the missing young man, but finds no trace of him up to the day of the great race.

Colonel Desha, the father of Sue, finds himself in financial straits—his ill luck at the race track and his continued confidence in his own stable having cost him many thousands of dollars, so that his entry carries his entire fortune. If his entry loses, the Colonel will be a broken man, while his daughter, Sue, must forego her pleasant life of social enjoyment. On the day of the race, honest old Jim Drake accidentally discovers the financial crisis which threatens to wreck the life of his friend, Colonel Desha. Drake is not too well supplied with this world's goods, but he has a heart as big as a hay stack and he plans to aid the Colonel in his distress. There is only one way to accomplish this. He withdraws "Speedway" from the entries and by this scratching of the favorite, the field is left open for a probable conquest by the thoroughbred entry from the stable of Colonel Desha. Drake realizes that there is no jockey the equal of Billy Garrison, so when he withdraws "Speedway" from the Carter Handicap, Garrison is released and instructed to ride the Desha entry.

Around the track they go, and in this most exciting finish, Billy pushes his mount to the front and triumphantly wins the race and purse for the Colonel. There is great excitement. Sue recognizes Billy as the young man in whose care she had entrusted her heart, but Billy, unconscious of what has passed during the period of his mental aberration, does not recognize her, although he is instinctively drawn to her. Jim Drake informs Major Calvert that Billy Garrison is his long lost nephew. The crooked stable man who doped "Sis" and Garrison and caused all the trouble confesses; explanations are made all around and everybody is happy. Billy Garrison has won life's handicap.

MARAH THE PYTHONESS (Lubin—Three Parts).—Marah Deane is known as "The Pythoness" because a tame Pythoness is her constant companion. She has many suitors, and finally chooses a rich man named John Sewell. Becoming ambitious to have a portrait painted, in which she shall appear fondling her serpent pet, Sewell writes to a friend of his, Jules Lestrange, a young artist, offering him the commission. Jules lives with his mother in comfortable quarters adjoining his studio, and living in his family is Marie Dalton, formerly his model, but now companion for his mother (Prudence) and also his promised wife. Sewell's letter brings great joy into the Lestrange family. Marah, the Pythoness, is deeply struck with this poetical young man and he at once becomes enraptured with her. The sittings for the picture are many, and these are often interrupted by communions with each other, until after a time, the artist neglects his mother and his fiancee, being seldom seen at home except to sleep. But his mother and fiancee have a firm friend in Dr. Rowell, a noted physician, who during the widowhood of Prudence, has come every day with a bouquet of flowers and an offer of marriage, only to be refused, because she is still true to the memory of her husband. The doctor has the entree to the house and entertainments given by the Pythoness Marah, and expresses the opinion that he can induce Jules to overcome his evident love for her, and awaken him to the fact that he has neglected those who are nearer and dearer to him. His efforts, however, are unsuccessful, and he is compelled to return to the artist's now unhappy home and report that the poor boy has really succumbed to the wiles of the temptress.

The picture is finished and exhibited at a reception. The success of the artist seems to draw Marah closer to him, much to the rage and consternation of Sewell, who resolves to break the tie between them. A similar vow is made by the Doctor, who enlists in his services, one Jeanne Druce, a butterfly in Marah's Bohemian circles, and she, taking Jules to a remote place in the reception room, tells him that he must cease all hope of ever winning Marah, since she will marry Jack Sewell and is only flirting. In an interview with Marah, Jules is told that it is only him she loves, and that she does not intend to marry Sewell. This interview is heard by the jealous Sewell, and while Marah is bidding her guests farewell for the night, he meets his artist rival in Marah's den, and draws his pistol to shoot him. Jules is unarmed and it is decided to flip a coin to see who will win the loaded pistol. Jules loses the toss, Sewell deliberately aims at him and fires. Marah comes into the room, and while horrified at the plight of her lover, decides that the episode must not become known. It being discovered that Jules is probably not fatally wounded, he is taken at dead of night to Sewell's yacht, and Sewell, Marah and a Doctor sail away with him to save his life. He lingers between life and death for several weeks, and in the meantime the mystery of his disappearance has caused his mother to fall desperately ill, and her life is despaired of. Many letters from Marie and Dr. Rowell have been written to Jules, but have been intercepted and destroyed. On recovery from his long siege of illness, Jules finds himself less in love with Marah, and full of remorse for his treatment of his family.

One day while sunning himself on the deck of the yacht, he sees in the personal columns of a newspaper this notice:

> PYTHONESS—Why are all letters to Artist unanswered? Tell him mother is dying.

Suddenly the truth flashes upon him, and he insists upon going ashore, which he does, accompanied by Marah, who refuses to be left alone, her object being to thwart his plans. At the same time Doctor Rowell enlists the services of the police in trying to find Jules for the suffering mother has passed away, and Jules comes ashore on the day of her funeral.

Marah succeeds in convincing the police that she knows nothing of the whereabouts of Jules, and sends for Sewell, who repulses her and leaves her with no companion but her oriental servants and her pet serpent. Jules arrives at home just as Dr. Rowell and Marie are returning from the funeral of his mother, and is crushed by the awful news. After a sleepless night, he rises early, goes to a drawer in his neglected studio and, taking from it his pistol, is about to kill himself, when Marie appears and convinces him that he has something to live for after all.

On the same morning Marah's fatihful servant Hassan goes to awaken her and finds her dead with the fatal folds of the Python about her neck.

THE SONG OF THE SOUL (George Kleine—Three Parts).—Ruth Benton, accompanist for the musical director of a big theater, is the sole support of her invalid grandmother, who is suddenly taken ill. The girl is forced to be with the aged sufferer constantly, and as the result of this enforced neglect of her duties at the theater, loses her position. The cutting off of her income just at the time when her grandmother's condition makes necessary the purchase of expensive medicines, nearly drives her to despair. She is forced to pawn the family jewels in order to meet the situation.

Then Ruth meets Robert Sheldon, a poor but promising musician, and the two young people fall in love. One night, while the invalid slumbers in an adjoining room, Bob composes a love song by the light of the moon. When he submits his composition to the manager of the local opera company, it is recognized as a work of great possibilities, and a public performance is promised. Ruth accompanies Bob when he goes to hear his song sung by one of the leading opera stars of the day, and is happy to share his triumph. When they return home they find Ruth's grandmother dead in her chair by the side of the grate fire.

After several years of happy married life, Bob and Ruth become prosperous and well known in the most exclusive social circles. He thoroughly enjoys the distinction of being considered a social lion, but Ruth prefers the quiet of their own home. Gradually they begin to drift apart, until at last Bob shamefully neglects his wife. One night while making merry with a party of gay companions, he is seriously injured in an auto accident. The doctor orders him to be taken to the seashore. Ruth accompanies him, and away from the lure of the city's gay life, finds him the same ardent lover that he was of old.

Her happiness is complete until the appearance of Kathryn Windell, an adventuress, who uses all her practiced powers of fascination to win the love of the young composer. Ruth recognizes her inability to hold her husband's heart. He is daily more and more in the company of the beautiful Kathryn, and at last, in an unguarded moment, openly makes love to her upon the beach. From the hotel balcony Ruth is sweeping the beach with her field glasses. Just as Bob folds Kitty in his arms, she turns her glasses on the pair. Then, hopeless and desperate, she seeks forgetfulness in the warm water of the Southern Sea.

One day their leader, Raymond, is informed by Singhar, one of the band's Hindoo spies, that an Englishman by the name of Norton, by whom Singhar has been engaged as body servant, is scouring the country in search of George Surrey, son of a wealth Englishman, who has disappeared some time before. Both the elder Surrey and the lad's sweetheart, Nellie, are nearly frantic over the absence of any word from him, and the father has offered a cash reward of $100,000 for the return of his son. Norton, so Singhar reports to Raymond, recently shot an eagle which carries, tied to its foot, a desperate appeal written in blood upon a piece of cloth. The note reads: "I am held a prisoner in the Temple of Kali and facing death. Come quick," and is signed "George Surrey."

Raymond immediately understands the importance of this bit of information. To make the acquaintance of Norton; to discover the prison in which George Surrey is held by the fanatical worshippers of the Hindoo goddess; to rescue him, to take him back to England and secure $100,000 reward—that is the program. Singhar introduces Raymond to Norton as a guide who will lead them to the ruined temple. This he does, but as soon as it is definitely established that George is indeed a prisoner in the ancient structure, Norton is attacked and overpowered by the members of the clan, buried alive waist-deep in the desert sand and left a prey to the ferocious beasts and birds of the region.

After he has left Norton to his fate and rescued Surrey from the hands of the fanatics, Raymond notices that the young fellow almost exactly resembles one of the most reckless of his own followers—a chap by the name of Lang. He immediately conceives a plan even more daring than the first—to hold George a prisoner in his command and go to England with Lang and present him as the son of the wealthy Mr. Surrey. In this way he hopes to gain possession, not only of $100,000 but the entire inheritance of the heir to the Surrey millions. So George once more finds himself a prisoner, this time in the hands of the famous "Golden Beetles." Raymond and Lang arrive in England. The elder Surrey and even the beautiful Nellie are deceived by the remarkable resemblance of Lang to the long-lost son and fiance.

In the meantime, Norton is discovered and rescued by some native hunters, just as he is about to be attacked in his defenseless position by a number of vultures. After a time he learns what has happened to Surrey and succeeds in rescuing him. They are pursued by clansmen, and after a long running fight elude their enemies and reach the coast, where they take to the sea in an open boat. A storm comes up and they are cast upon the rocky coast of a barren island inhabited only by ferocious wild beasts. Many times their lives are threatened by lions, but by husbanding their ammunition, they are able to fight them off until a sail is sighted and they are rescued from the island by the boat crew of a liner bound for England. Arriving in the mother country they are again set upon by the agents of the clan, but after a series of adventures succeed in reaching Surrey's home just in time to prevent the marriage of Nellie to Lang, whom she believes to be George. After a sharp battle between the "Golden Beetles" and the police, the renegades are captured and brought to justice.

THE HOUSE NEXT DOOR (Five Parts—Lubin).—The story opens at the home of Sir John Cotswolt, who, with his wife and two children, Cecil and Ulrica keep up a fair appearance of rather poor aristocracy. In the park the children play with Adrian and Esther Jacobson, children of Isaac Jacobson, a humble but honest Jewish chairmaker. The Christian parents chide their children for playing with "Jewish brats." Sir John's affairs are in bad condition and his attorney informs him that he is likely to become bankrupt. A patent lawyer notifies the chairmaker that a machine Jacobson has invented had been granted a patent. Fifteen years pass, the children have grown to maturity and the chairmaker, now wealthy, lives in a mansion next door to Sir John Cotswolt. The children not forgetting their old playmates renew acquaintance and fall in love all around. Cecil Cotswolt is ardently wooing Esther Jacobson and Adrian Jacobson is paying sweet court to the gorgeous Urlica Cotswolt. Then comes the clash of race and religions and both of the fathers open deadly opposition to the love affairs of their children, who still meet clandestinely. The fight is a long and hard one, but the lovers are still true to their troth. Cecil Cotswolt develops a wonderful voice and though the family are in straitened circumstances, Ulrica, his sister, draws upon a personal inheritance and sends her brother to Italy for tuition, this much against the wishes of the old baronet, who declares that his son shall never become a player or as he calls it a mountebank. Cecil and Esther part with vows of eternal constancy. Sir John then proposes to select a husband for his daughter and introduces a young aristocrat named Trevor, but Urlica has no use for the insipid dandy and is very clever in letting him see it.

Two years later, Cecil has returned and is to make his debut at the Grand Opera House in the role of Faust. Both families are agog at the event and all attend the performance except the irascible old Sir John. The performance scored the most pronounced success known for years. The players were showered with bouquets, hats and handkerchiefs were waved in the air, the entire audience were upon their feet and even the Cotswolt's and Jacobson's shook hearty hands from adjoining boxes. Cecil's triumph did not appease the old man and the next day when the drawing room was packed with flowers Sir John to vent his temper kicked the bouquets all over the place. And still the war of the parents went on, and the young lovers could only live and hope. The next blow to Sir John was the fact that Isaac Jacobson was Knighted in recompense for his many good and charitable deeds. It was noticed that the foundation of the Cotswolt Mansion was becoming weak and was sinking into a sewer. As the houses adjoined, Sir Isaac employed the builders to make repairs. The digging and noise of the workmen caused Sir John much annoyance and he hurled many maledictions at his neighbor. During the progress of the repairs, one night, a dancing party was given in Sir Isaac's house. The merriment was at its height when a fearful crash was heard. The guests rushed out and saw the House Next Door collapsing, everybody ran to the rescue and Jacobson entered the falling building and himself brought out Sir John Cotswolt. The old man was taken into the Jacobson house and put to bed, he was seriously but not mortally injured. Both families are gathered around the bed and Cotswolt grasped the hand of his Jewish neighbor and there the promise was given that united the Jews and Christians in one family.

WHEN LIONS ESCAPE (Columbus—Three Parts—Oct. 26).—When Edward Strong, a successful stockbroker, led home as his bride a lion tamer, all his friends predicted that she would ruin his life. The most gloomy prophecies were uttered as to how his wife would bring hordes of Bohemian friends to his home, and that he would be in the divorce court within a year. But unfortunately for these gloomy prophets their forebodings did not come true. The father of Margaret, the wife, was a Polish count who had been expelled for political reasons, and having lost all his estates he took up circus work as he was a magnificent rider. From a child Margaret was brought up among the animals, and as she grew older she became a lion-tamer.

When she married Strong she was glad to leave behind her circus life. Still she had a fondness for her lions and kept them, and once every year she used to give a private entertainment to which all her friends were invited. On one of these occasions two explorers, who had just returned from Central Africa, were introduced. Tuthill, one of the explorers, was interested in the exhibition of Margaret's power, but warned her that if at any time she herself felt afraid her command over the lions would end.

A game of baccarat was then suggested by Charles Brandon, the other explorer. Strong took a hand, and it was remarkable to notice the way Brandon always won. After losing five thousand dollars in five minutes Strong thought he had better stop. He retired, and, standing by the glass door, took out a cigarette. As he was about to light it he noticed a movement on the part of Brandon that aroused his suspicion, and he watched the glass. A minute or two later the game finished and Brandon come out. Strong spoke to him and asked him for a light. As he lifted up his arm Strong saw a card concealed up his cuff and seized his little finger, and, holding him thus, extracted the cards. Brandon was mad with rage but powerless, and Strong merely smiled contemptuously at him. Then he told him he would not show him up if he signed a paper agreeing to lose the five thousand dollars at cards that evening "which I have obtained by cheating." With inward curses Brandon signed the note.

Just as they were repairing to the card room they heard a noise, and Tuthill was brought out fainting. He had had a sunstroke and had been warned against excitement, but the chances of the cards were too much for him and brought on a stroke. A doctor present told them that the patient must be left alone, and there must be no disturbing noise. Brandon was enraged at having been found a cheat. Even though Strong did not show him up he knew that people would become suspicious. It was in this frame of mind that Brandon heard the doctor's report, and thought over this remark of the doctor's about the effect a suggestion would have upon Tuthill's mind. He thought to himself that if he could make him the instrument of his vengeance upon Strong there would be no chance for suspicion. It would be put down as the result of his illness, and anything he might do would be unpunished. With this idea in his mind he went to Tuthill's bedroom. The sufferer was lying in a delirious state on the bed, and Brandon whispered in his ear the suggestion that he should bind Strong when he come to see him and loose the lions. At first the last relics of intelligence struggled against the idea, but Brandon's strong will soon conquered these. Then he hid to see his plot carried out.

Strong sent all the guests and servants into a large smoking room built at the end of the garden, so as to give Tuthill absolute silence. Then he went to give Tuthill the medicine the doctor ordered for him. He entered the room and prepared the medicine and while he was doing so Tuthill wrenched the electric light cable from the table lamp. Then he only drank part of the medicine and asked his host to put more water with it. As he turned to do so, Tuthill sprang upon him and tied his hands behind his back with the cord. While Strong was trying to break this the madman dashed into the corridor and seized a bundle of rope kept in case of fire and then returned and bound Strong to the bed.

The madman went down to the lions' cage and loosed them. Strong made desperate efforts to free himself, succeeding to break loose from the bed to which he was tied, and to squirm towards the door. A moment afterwards the lithe creatures came pawing at the door. Strong got his shoulder against it and pushed for dear life. Under the lions' pressure the door came ajar, but they soon tired for the time and moved on to the neighboring room, in which was Margaret's little girl. The child had not fallen asleep and was sitting up in bed playing with her toys when the lions entered.

Margaret was waiting in the smoking room for her husband's return. When he did not come she got anxious and rang him up. She got no answer and determined to go and see what was happening. When she entered the hall she heard her husband's cries and her child's. For a moment she hesitated between husband and child, but the mother instinct prevailed. For a moment she was able to drive away the lions and picking up the child she fled to the telephone. But this very moment of flight weakened her hold over the animals and they began to follow her. As the guests were wondering where their host and hostess were, the telephone rang, and they learned that the lions had broken loose. They seized pistols and hastened to the house where they could hear the roaring of the lions. When Tuthill loosened the lions he wandered through the house until he fell asleep.

When the guests broke into the house the lions were getting ferociuos but fled before their pistols, and Margaret and the child were rescued just as her nerves were giving way. Next they went to the room where her husband was imprisoned and loosened him. While this was happening Tuthill began to come to, and dimly remembered what had happened. Slowly the dreadful reality of what he had done came over him. As Strong heard the plot against him his rage against Brandon knew no bounds and he understood how the other had been used as a mere tool. They set out to hunt for Brandon to bring him to justice. They found him lying facing the white ceiling with a look of fear in his sightless eyes that banished all hatred. A mightier hand than theirs had inflicted punishment.

THE POWER OF THE PRESS (Biograph K. & E., Special—Four Parts).—An innocent man, serving a sentence of five years in prison through the perjured testimony of the real criminal, Steve Carson, foreman of a shipyard, strikes up a warm friendship with his cell mate, Harold Norwood, a defaulting paying teller. No less strange than their friendship is the befriending of Steve's wife, Annie, by Julia Seymour, prima donna, who is Norwood's wife. As a reward of good behavior, the men are released on Christmas morning. Annie is bewildered by the receipt of a bank book which shows that large deposits of gold have been made in her name and that of her sister, Mary, by their uncle, George Hosford, who, dying in Alaska, has entrusted the book to Joe Hawes, a fellow prospector. Hawes, coming to New York, has met Turner Morgan, Steve's predecessor as foreman of the shipyard, who bears Carson a lasting grudge and has fastened upon him the crime for which he was imprisoned. Morgan has tried to get the money, failed and lost the book. Anstey, a cub reporter on a daily paper, gets wind of the case and by clever work discovers the truth. In his big story, through "the power of the press," Steve is vindicated, and Morgan's infamy bared to the world after his counterfeiting den is raided by the police.

little creature of the woods. He thinks of her only as an interesting child, however, and when visited by his scapegrace brother, Gerald, who is by his own confession "a constant worshipper at the shrine of woman," Arnold views with alarm and discomfort Gerald's flirtatious attitude toward little Letty. Gerald hails Arnold's nickname of "Wildflower" as appropriate to Letty, and begins an ardent courtship of the child-woman, whose innocence and ignorance lead her to mistake the dross for gold. After a tempestuous wooing, Letty is swept off her feet by the impetuous Gerald, and elopes with him. Arnold learns of the elopement, and immediately pursues the pair, reaching them just after the wedding ceremony has been concluded. After a struggle with his brother, Arnold knocks Gerald down, and by means of train and auto spirits Letty away from her new-made husband, despite her desperate efforts to escape, all of which he thwarts. Arnold takes Letty to the old Fifth avenue mansion of the Boyds in New York, and introduces her there to the members of the household as his wife, telling Letty this course is necessary to protect her reputation, but not fully explaining why. Even Letty's parents, who know of the elopement, do not know which of the Boyds she has married.

Overborne by Arnold's arguments and masterful manner, Letty reluctantly consents to remain in the Boyd home for a time, as Arnold's "wife in name only," till such time as Gerald should come to claim her, which she is sure will be soon. The situations which follow swiftly illustrate in turn Letty's ignorance of the world, her natural innocence, her unfamiliarity with the customs and manners of society, her hot temper, and finally, her generosity and sympathy. The strange secret that Arnold is guarding from her is at last revealed, and there is a mighty readjustment of relations. The stern, elder brother, who had at first only sought to save a woman's reputation, and guard his own family honor, now comes to dream only of love. There is a tremendous renunciation on Letty's part, that at first almost crushes the delicate girl, but becomes less terrible as she realizes the noble nature of the man who has guarded her. At the crisis of the drama her own strength and character is the determining force; the wild flower of the woods becomes as a flaming bush, before which both men bow in awe of an innocence as defensive as the strongest armor. As Letty grows to know Arnold better she finds that the older brother is not the cruel master she had thought him, but the finer man of the two, and at last the drooping little Wildflower revives and blooms happily in the garden of Arnold's faithful love.

BURNING DAYLIGHT (Five Parts—Bosworth). Elam Harnish, one of the most daring prospectors in pioneer Alaska, had never rode his "hunch" to the tune of eleven millions before he pulled out for "the States" to sit in the big game in San Francisco. Accompanied by his faithful Indian servant, Kama, he waved good-bye to his friends in Dawson and started out with his dog-teams across the snows to civilization. Only one was missing from the group that cheered his departure. This was Nell, a dance-hall girl, to whom he had never given anything but friendship, but who had loved him so devotedly that she could not endure to have him go out of her life. Of her tragic end he knew nothing till a later day, when his enemies attempted to use the story to his undoing.

Sailing into the beautiful harbor of San Francisco, we see him gazing eagerly ahead, keen for adventure, with a sparkling determination to win out as completely in the game as played in the financial centers of the country as in the grim battle with Nature in the mountains. Breezily sure of himself, he is easy prey for the group of scheming financiers which use him for their tool, and he comes very near to losing all the money wrested from the grim years in Alaska. Only his daring and his contempt for his own life save him, but the experience was a valuable one, and he learns to meet his competitors in the money market on their own ground.

The city's worship of wealth, to which he insensibly becomes a convert, makes him cruel and grasping. The ease of city life makes him soft and pleasure-loving. In the "big game" he comes to believe that Fate has dealt him three cards—battle, revenge and cocktails. These he plays ruthlessly.

Meantime, without his knowledge, and even more emphatically without his wish, Fate has been dealing a fourth card, Love. At first his stenographer, beautiful Dede Mason, meant no more to him than any of the employees in his suite of offices, though he found himself deferring to her more and more. One Sunday he met her on a country road among the hills across the harbor, and caught the cool, appraising glance with which she measured him and his group of flashy, noisy friends. She was riding her thoroughbred, Fiesta, and passed quickly but quite suddenly he realized what she had come to be to him. With characteristic energy he devotes himself to winning her with irresistible earnestness and devotion. But she is not easily won, and with the unique test that Love imposes on him, this drama comes to a close.

GREAT NORTHERN FILM CO.

AFTER THIRTY YEARS (Three Parts).—Tom Black, as a result of his lawless youth, is serving a life-term in prison. During his long confinement he has learned how terrible was his dissipation in his early days and has repented for the crime he committed. In his sleep he reviews all the events which led to his downfall: his excessive drinking; outbursts of temper; the loss of his position; his acceptance of a friend's proposition to commit robbery; his murderer of the woman in charge of a jewelry shop; his capture, trial and conviction, and his mother's death as the outcome. These recollections cause him to cry out in his sleep many a night so that guards rush to his cell to quiet him. He is a model prisoner and is well liked by all the attendants.

At the services in chapel he listens eagerly to every word the chaplain utters in the hope that his promise of salvation applies to him. He attracts the attention of the chaplain, who visits Tom in his cell. After a heart-to-heart talk with the chaplain Tom falls on his knees in prayer. The chaplain is so affected by Tom's case that he secures his pardon. Tom is dumbfounded, but upon realizing that he is free once more is overjoyed. He is paid the money earned while in prison and departs.

Everything looks strange to him in the streets after his thirty years' imprisonment. On account of his old-fashioned clothes and his hunted expression, people are suspicious of him and avoid him. He visits his mother's grave in the cemetery. Then he seeks his only living relative, his sister, who at first fails to recognize him, and when she does, she makes it plain that he is not welcome at her home. He is allowed to partake of a meager meal only after giving up what little money he has. His sister, her husband and a friend of theirs neglect him so palpably during the meal that he is glad to leave their house and get away from them. Heartbroken and discouraged, he returns to the prison and begs to be taken back, but is refused, and it seems to him that he is not wanted anywhere. He goes out into the country where all is quiet and peaceful and lying on the ground, falls asleep. In his dreams he sees his mother holding out her arms to him. He never wakes from this sleep, for exposure to the night air in his weakened condition proves fatal.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode 17—Reels 33 and 34).—After their desperate ruse to get Florence incarcerated in a pest house had failed, Braine and his fellow conspirators determine on a new plan, which gives promise of effectually removing Norton from interference with their getting the missing million. Braine's hatred of the reporter is intense. He has been the marplot, who again has defeated their schemes. With him out of the way, the conspirators feel that their evil doings will be easy accomplished.

In pursuance of this plan the Countess, who has received a note from Florence, accepting an invitation from her to visit a florist's to purchase some rare exotic plants for the garden of the Hargreaves, cleverly forges a note to Norton. Later, while Florence is with her at the florist' a messenger hands Norton the following:

"Darling Jim:

"I am going to a tea at Mrs. General Aspinwall's, No. 49 Juniper street. Will you meet me there at four o'clock and bring me home? I'm especially anxious to see you as there are lots of things I want to talk to you about. So don't fail me and be sure and come.

"Lovingly,

"Flo."

Having seen Florence the evening before, Norton is surprised to receive the note, as she had said nothing about this engagement, but suspects nothing. Telephoning the Hargreave home he learns that Florence is out for the afternoon and this makes him certain that everything is all right. When Florence returns, after bidding good-bye to the Countess, she learns that Norton has telephoned to say he will meet her in response to her note. She becomes frantic with the realization that he must be in danger. A hurried inquiry at his office, where she learns that he has gone for the day, confirms this. She bursts into tears.

Meanwhile much has been happening. A suspicious-looking individual loitering about the Hargreave grounds attracts old Jones' attention. He follows the man, when he leaves. Trailing him to a small house in a remote district, to the butler's great astonishment he sees Norton enter the house by the front door soon after the other has entered by the back. Realizing the reporter is walking blindly into a trap, Jones, after a minute's wait, walks to the back door where he gives the signal, which he had seen the conspirator give. He is admitted by the Countess Olga, her features concealed by a heavy veil. On recognizing him, struggles to prevent his entrance. There is a sound of breaking glass, and shrieked imprecations in the room beyond. Jones, realizing that Norton is battling for his life, brushes the Countess aside and rushes toward the sounds of strife.

When Norton entered the house he was received by Braine, disguised as a venerable military man, who told him Florence had stepped out with his daughter. While they waited her return, would Mr. Morton partake of an old soldier's hospitality? The reporter assented. Yet there was something about the glass of wine which the servant offered him, which made him pause ere taking it. Instead, he poised it in the air before him while his white-haired host offered a toast. A curious thing happened. Norton saw in the depths of the goblet, as in a mirror, the figure of a man—the same that old Jones had trailed—whose upraised hand brandished a heavy blackjack. Norton, quick of action, dashed the wine over his shoulder into his attacker's face. At once a desperate struggle began. One of the conspirators threw open a trap door in the floor of the room, which opened into an iron walled vault in the cellar. Toward this Braine and his confederates fought to force Norton.

At the instant when their efforts were successful, old Jones burst into the room. Rushing at Braine and the servant, the other thug having been knocked out by a blow of Norton's before they were aware of his presence, Jones tumbled them both through the trap into which they had just forced the reporter. Seizing a heavy tablecloth he lowered it to Norton, who had put both Braine and the other man out of action. The reporter soon was dragged back through the trap door into the room. There was a brief struggle with the third crook, who, recovering, attacked them with a knife, but he was subdued, and Norton and Jones, thinking they had the gang all safe, went for the police.

But they had forgotten the Countess Olga. Before the two reach the police station, she has opened the secret door leading to the vault and freed her comrades. When the police arrive they find that the birds have flown.

SAWYER.

THE ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY (Five Parts).—The Countess of Northstone, wife of the Prime Minister of a great power, gives a lawn party at her country home. Among her guests is an ambassador whose government is suspected of plotting a war against the country to which he is accredited. The prime Minister asks his wife to obtain as much information as she can from the ambassador, who is in love with her. She plays with him and, as he is fully convinced that he has conquered her, his secretary brings him a note. Lady Sibil plays with him pretending the note is from a woman. To vindicate himself he shows her the letter—"Meet me at the Carlton Club tonight. Important information," the note is signed, von Hatzfeldt. The Countess knows this man as the leader of a party called "The Brotherhood," which was formed for anarchistic purposes.

Leaving the Ambassador she at once seeks Captain Balfour, secretary to the Prime Minister and asks him to play the spy "In the Interests of Your Country." He goes to the club and obtains positive proof that the Ambassador has been bought with the crime money of the "Brotherhood" represented by Baron von Hatzfeldt. The Foreign Ambassadors are received by the Prime Minister that evening at his official residence. While the reception is in progress a note arrives from the continent, "Declaration of war is imminent unless stragetic diplomacy is used. Send special envoy with full power to act at once." Salston, who is the representative on the continent of the Great Power, is in fact its Ambassador. That night at the reception Baron von Hatzfeldt is confronted with the proofs of his treachery and the Countess exposes him to the people and tells what he was ten years before. We see him as a leader of a detachment of soldiers invading a peaceful country and shooting down unarmed and defenceless peasants, and also see him murdering the brother of the countess as he lies asleep in his bed. At the end of the story the wife of the Baron enters, and sorrow for her makes the Prime Minister relax his decision of punishment and he permits them to go with the understanding that they leave the country at once. This they agree to do. Balfour is to be sent as an Envoy Extraordinary to the foreign power and is to use his best efforts to avert the threatened declaration of war. As he is leaving his apartments he is attacked by the Baron and the Ambassador, assisted by their hirelings. They think he has information about him as to the purport of his mission and attempt to rob him. Fortunately his instructions are verbal, so they accomplish nothing. In revenge they place him on a steamer and put to sea, intending to rid themselves of him at the first chance. He is disabled but gradually his reason and strength return and when attacked by the crew he gives a good account of himself. He is overpowered at last and made to walk the plank into the sea. Thinking Balfour is dead they return to port, but blindfolded and with hands and feet tied, he manages to reach the shore and is revived by some fishermen. He again starts on his mission.

A wonderful scene in the palace of the Emperor is shown; the Emperor is surrounded by his chief officers and civilian advisers and announces amid great enthusiasm that war against the world is declared. Fighting his way to the Emperor the Envoy Extraordinary reaches the council room as the Emperor is signing the document. Seizing it he tears it to pieces and in the scene which ensues he convinces the Emperor and his advisers that it is better not to fight. To this they readily agree when shown the reason. Balfour returns to his own country and, as both the Baron and the Ambassador demand "satisfaction," they get it, but in a way that can hardly be called pleasing to them. The Baron is beaten at the game he himself invites. In the duel with the Ambassador, it is very evident that the Ambassador will hardly serve his country again. Balfour receives the thanks of his country and all ends as wars should end, with satisfaction and peace on all sides.

DOC (Four Parts).—As the result of an accident due to the carelessness of Bill Travers, the engineer of the Blue Top Quarries, two of the workmen are seriously injured by the falling of a hoist. The engineer, who was under the influence of liquor at the time, is discharged by Mr. Eastman, the owner of the quarries. In revenge Bill and his pal steal Mr. Eastman's baby boy. Bill's pal is shot by Mr. Eastman as he is making off and is seriously wounded.

Mrs. Eastman is overcome by the shock of the loss of the baby, and Mr. Eastman sends for "Doc," as he is popularly known by everyone in the village. "Doc" is a young surgeon who has made a name for himself among the residents of the town. He has a hard time financially and when he received a call from the owner of Blue Top he feels that he has at last an opportunity to make good and possibly a chance to secure the berth of doctor at the quarries. After attending Mrs. Eastman he is curtly dismissed by Mr. Eastman and his hopes for a lucrative position are dashed to the ground. His sweetheart, Betty, bids him be brave, saying that his turn will surely come. In the meantime Mr. Eastman has had the sheriff's posse out hunting for the lost child but to no avail.

Bill's pal suffers tremendously from the wound and Bill makes the journey from the mountain cabin to the village on a mule. He persuades "Doc" to return with him to attend to his injured friend. He insists on blindfolding "Doc" so that "Doc" cannot reveal the location of the cabin. "Doc," through Betty, suspects that Bill may have the stolen child hidden in the cabin and on his second trip to the cabin his suspicions prove correct. He tells Mr Eastman who foolishly advises the sheriff, who lays a trap for Bill. Bill is captured but refuses to lead the men to the cabin, with the result that Mrs. Eastman is prostrated with sorrow. "Doc" finally decides to trust to Betty's horse, which he has ridden to the cabin on the occasions of his visits. The horse, which has been fed each time at the cabin, leads the way and the baby is found and restored to his mother's arms. "Doc" is rewarded by the coveted berth at the quarries and is enabled to marry his heart's desire.

ALCO.

THE NIGHTINGALE (All Star—Five Parts). —Franti, an organ grinder of the poor districts of New York, has a daughter, Isola, who sings to his street piano's accompaniment. Andrea, a worthless son, and a member of the notorious "Red Galvin Gang," is a great burden on his father and sister. Nathan Marden, a wealthy banker, is attracted by the wonderful voice of Isola, the street singer, as is also his son, Charles Marden. Andrea, the worthless son, upon refusal of his continual demand for money, is over-heard complaining by the gang, who send his father a black hand letter, threatening destruction if their demands are refused.

Charles Marden, not being able to forget the wonderful voice and attractive appearance of the street singer, solicits his friend, David Mantz, a vocal instructor, to help him find the unknown artist. Mantz locates Isola and offers her vocal training, but her father will not listen to it, and she reluctantly declines. Franti, refusing the demands of the black handers, is killed by a bomb, and Isola and Andrea left alone divide their meagre inheritance. After her father's death, Isola goes to Mantz and accepts his offer, not knowing that Charles Marden is interested, and is later on sent to Paris to continue her studies with Jean De Resni. The story of her entrance to the Paris opera stage, the longed-for opportunity and her success and popularity are cleverly told on the screen.

Charles Marden is present the night of Isola's debut. Enthusiastic over her success, he arranges a dinner party in celebration, and afterward, having partaken a bit too freely, he forces his attentions on Isola, and finally brutally tells her that she owe him everything for her success. Brokenhearted on learning this, she moves, leaving no trace. Meanwhile an offer has been received for her for the Metro Opera of New York Every nook and corner of Paris are searched and she is finally located in poverty, singing at a cabaret entertainment.

She returns to America, and at her debut at the Metro Opera House, Charles Marden endeavors to see her, and meets with refusal. His efforts later on are successful, and love shows the way to a happy marriage.

Nathan Marden, the father, refuses his permission, but with the coming of Nathan Marden, the second, the happy grandfather forgives. In the meanwhile, the worthless brother, Andrea, goes from bad to worse, and having located Isola by chance, demands money. Later urged by Red Galvin, the gangster, they plot to rob the home of Nathan Marden, Sr., who is killed in the robbery.

Galvin is arrested, but Andrea, although wounded, makes his escape. He sends for his sister; and she while searching for a bandage, discovers a scarf pin, which connects Andrea with the robbery Charles Marden suspects the frequent absence of his wife while nursing her brother, and traces her to Andrea's room where, misunderstanding the situation he denounces her He takes their son and leaves home, vowing never to return. Later, he reads of the death of Andrea Franti, and learns that he is Isola's brother, whereupon their love returns to build for future happiness.

THE RAGGED EARL (Five Parts—Popular Plays and Players Oct. 12) Gerald Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, whose estates are down-at-heel and out-at-elbows, owing to the improvidence of his ancestors, is known as "the ragged earl." Though creditors press and bailiffs threaten, he meets his problems with a laugh, trusting to a kind providence and his solicitors in Dublin to provide for his future. It had been the plan of Gerald's father that he marry a wealthy cousin, but the young Earl had always thought of marriage as a necessary evil in the life of every man to be put off as long as possible. He heartily disapproved of a marriage prearranged. Bills have been piling up, however, and when he calls upon his solicitors for a remittance, he is surprised to receive a letter from them, enclosing the sum of twenty-three pounds, which is all that remains of the quarterly rent collection from the estate. In the letter, his solicitors respectfully suggest that it would be well for him to consider an early marriage with his cousin, in accordance with his father's wishes. Though he dislikes the idea, Gerald is forced to admit that it is the only means of saving the ancestral estates. At the nearby castle live Sir Henry Hardcastle, his mother, Mrs. Fitzmaurice, and her stepdaughters, Kathleen and Una. Sir Henry is also in financial difficulties, and aided by his mother, is endeavoring to persuade Kathleen to marry Lord Wildbrook, a wealthy old roue, who is willing to pay Sir Henry handsomely for his influence with the girl. Kathleen is heartbroken at the prospect, and after a stormy scene with her step-brother, disguises herself as a boy, and runs away, taking Una with her. In the morning Sir Henry discovers their flight, and sends one of his retainers, Ralph Forrestor, after them. Ralph overtakes them, and is about to force them to return, when Gerald, who has heard Kathleen's screams, appears.

He drives Ralph off, and takes the two girls to Kilkare Castle, never suspecting that Kathleen is other than she appears—a very handsome boy. At the Castle Kathleen's manner arouses the suspicions of Sarah McHugh, the motherly old woman who had been Gerald's nurse, and who still thinks him a mere boy, in need of her protection and advice. She discovers Kathleen's true sex, but, greatly attracted by the girl, promises to keep it a secret from Gerald. The Ragged Earl has decided to contract the marriage with his cousin and writes a letter to his aunt, requesting permission to call upon them in Dublin. This letter falls into the hands of Ralph, who has been sent by Wildbrook and Sir Henry to kidnap the girls, with promises of a large reward if he succeeded. Ralph manages to reach Kathleen and shows her the letter. Gerald has already awakened her love, and when she sees this evidence of his intention to marry, she agrees to return with Ralph. That night she steals from the castle, with the sleeping Una in her arms, and returns to her step-brother's house. When Gerald learns of their departure, he makes a formal call upon Sir Henry, enquiring for "Edward," the name under which Kathleen has posed as a boy, but is told that "there is no such person as Edward in the castle" He is forced to accept this as the truth, and, believing that Kathleen has gone elsewhere, he returns to Kilkea. There he tells Sarah of his failure, and she, suspecting the truth, goes to Hardcastle's, where she sees Kathleen. She tells Gerald that the boy is there, and he dashes off with Larry and Patrick, two of his retainers, to rescue "Edward" When he arrives, he scales the balcony to the great hall of the castle, where he finds Kathleen in her true person. When he realizes that the "beautiful boy" is really an even more beautiful girl, he is determined to rescue her. He succeeds in abducting Wildbrook, and in getting Kathleen out of the castle in the care of Larry and Patrick, but his own escape is cut off by Ralph Forrestor and Sir Henry. In the fight which follows, Gerald is disarmed. He is at the mercy of Sir Henry's blade when he sees a suit of ancient armor supported by a huge two-handed sword He overturns tables and chairs in Sir Henry's path, reaches the armor and secures the sword Fighting off his opponents, he manages to cut his way through the great window and escape Gerald's retainers and peasants have been aroused by Sarah, and have come to his assistance. A fierce battle is in progress between his men and the Hardcastle retainers. The clubs of Gerald's forces are no match for the Hardcastle swords, however, and his men are slowly beaten off. Kathleen is recaptured by Sir Henry, and is taken to the castle. Gerald escapes and is returning to Kilkea, discouraged, when he overtakes Wildbrook who is fleeing in terror He conceives a plan and in a secluded spot he forces Wildbrook to change clothes with him. Then he returns to Sir Henry's castle. He learns that Kathleen has been taken to a neighboring church, and that a servant has been sent to find Wildbrook, in order that the marriage may take place at once Believing Gerald to be the old Lord, the servant tells him to hurry to the church. He reaches the chapel, and manages to disclose his real identity to Kathleen and the priest. Kathleen of course agrees to the marriage, much to the surprise of Sir Henry. As the party leaves the church, Lord Wildbrook, dressed in Gerald's clothes, stumbles in. In the darkness he is mistaken for Gerald, and is nearly killed by Ralph before he can make himself known. When his identity is learned, Gerald is made a prisoner, but is saved by Mrs. Fitzmaurice, who arrives, declaring that he has fairly won Kathleen. She gives her blessing to the Earl and Countess of Kildare.

Has it ever occurred to you that:

A GREAT GENERAL

Needs imagination above all other qualities? That he must see possibilities of victory hidden from other eyes? That in proportion to his vision are his successes?

A motion picture director needs more imagination than a general. If he sees clearly the possibilities that lie in every idea, and sees them well, his negative sells many prints.

The man who saw the hidden victories in:

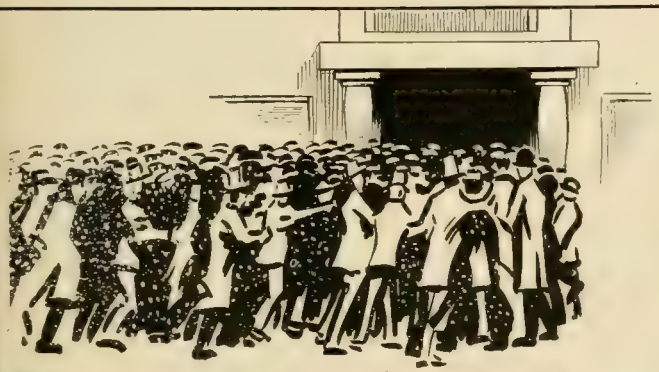
"Beasts of the Jungle" (Solax), "The Equine Spy" (Solax), "The Coastguard's Bride" (Victor), "A Million in Pearls" (Victor), "Brennan of the Moor" (Solax), "Lincoln's Thanksgiving" (Special), "Enmeshed by Fate" (Victor), "Kelly of the Emerald Isle" (Solax), "The Daughter of a Crook" (Victor), "The Sewer" (Solax), "The Beggar Prince of India" (Victor), "The Making of a Boy Scout" (Special), and more than 100 single reel comedies and dramas

Is still in possession of his imagination. His name is

EDWARD WARREN

13 West 82nd Street, New York City.

And he is at present at liberty.



Educate the Public to Save You Money

By saying the number of tickets wanted without being asked "How Many?"

You lose money when your patrons come to your ticket window in parties of two, three or four and your ticket seller asks "How many?" The patron hesitates, looks around, reaches for his money and answers. That costs you money. But you lose most when there is a crowd in front of your window and people pass your place up to go where they think they won't have to stand. That's the big loss. There may be lots of empty seats inside, but that crowd in front of your window drives the others away. Our "How Many?" sign asks the question to every patron and gets his money in his hand before he reaches the window. Then your ticket seller can get him away from the window quick. That's the idea. What's the use of spending big money for an automatic ticket counting machine if your ticket seller is losing all the time saved saying "How Many"?

Every hour you are open our "How Many?" sign educates the people to save you money by getting their tickets quick.

Our "How Many?" sign is made of heavy plate glass, all edges beveled and polished. The letters are silver, cut into the glass and can not be removed. Background is permanent dark green and the border silver. The sign complete with waterproof back, silver plated fittings and four feet of chain, shipped prepaid on receipt of $1.50. You'll save that on one crowded night. Guaranteed to please you. Your money back if you want it. Order yours today.

No matter how thrilling a story one may read, interest is not sustained if poor type, poor paper and poor press work make hard work for the eyes. It's the same with motion pictures. A clear picture is as necessary as a good scenario.

Because the basic product is right, the clearest pictures are on "Eastman" film. Look for the stencil mark in the margin.

MR. EXHIBITOR: Your Success Depends, Not Upon Promises, but Upon Actual Results Obtained

Some Screen Manufacturers Will Promise You Everything and Anything, BUT—Will They Guarantee to Keep Their Promises?

Will they guarantee their screen for five years against cracking, peeling, deteriorating—tarnishing or turning black?
Will they guarantee their screen is climate proof and can be washed with soap and water?
Will they guarantee perfect projection regardless of how close your seats are placed to the screen, or angle?
Will they guarantee perfect projection, without haze, glare or eye-strain?
Will they really guarantee the saving on Current Used?

We are Guided by Our Policy of Six Years to Under- claim Rather Than Over-claim. You Can Rest Assured That We Do Not Exaggerate or Misrepresent. Therefore Feel Secure in Accepting Our Representations at Their Full Worth.

WE GUARANTEE MIRROROIDE FOR FIVE YEARS TO SUBSTANTIATE EVERY CLAIM WE MAKE AS ABOVE. WILL THEY?

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

Phenomenal Growth

St. Louis!

—Forty-eight out of 99 theatres in the city of St. Louis are using that Universal program. Just think what a terrific percentage this is when you stop to consider all the other film manufacturers which are represented by exchanges in this district!
—In the uptown district there are eight big houses the finest in all America, even finer than the Strand of New York and THE UNIVERSAL IS BEING SHOWN IN SIX OF THE EIGHT!
—Isn't it beginning to dawn upon you that THE UNIVERSAL MUST HAVE THE CLASS OR IT COULD NEVER ATTRACT SUCH A MASS OF BUSINESS?

Competitors are cutting prices right and left to avoid losing customers to the Universal. But the Universal is getting full price from everyone and is relying solely on QUALITY to hold its tremendous share of the business!

Use the brains God gave you!

Portland!

—There are 61 moving picture houses in the city of Portland, Ore.
—The Universal exchange is serving 21 of these with full service; seven with a seventy-five per cent service; and four with fifty per cent of their service.
—Statistics ordinarily are dry things but every exhibitor who knows how the Oregon field is covered by representatives of film concerns will gasp when he grasps the meaning of these figures. The Universal is so far ahead that it hasn't even a close second!

Competitors are cutting prices right and left to avoid losing customers to the Universal. But the Universal is getting full price from everyone and is relying solely on QUALITY to hold its tremendous share of the business!

New Orleans!

—There are 74 active moving picture theatres in New Orleans and the Universal has the honor of serving 31 REGULAR WEEKLY CUSTOMERS.
—This does not include six other houses which are getting a commercial Universal service. It is also interesting to note that 41 of the 74 theatres in New Orleans are booked for "The Trey O'Hearts."
—Moreover our southern friends, like our northern ones, are so overjoyed with the quality of that Universal program that all efforts on the part of competitors to pry them loose have failed miserably!

Competitors are cutting prices right and left to avoid losing customers to the Universal. But the Universal is getting full price from everyone and is relying solely on QUALITY to hold its tremendous share of the business!

Detroit!

—There are 120 active theatres in Detroit. Of this number 52 are using Universal service. Over 43 per cent of the whole business is Universal. And the manager of the Detroit Universal exchange writes very modestly that he considers this "a fair showing."
—This does not include the theatres that are booking our serials nor does it include theatres which WANT THE UNIVERSAL PROGRAM BUT CAN'T GET IT BECAUSE THEY ARE LOCATED TOO CLOSE TO HOUSES WHICH WE ARE NOW SUPPLYING.
—Gentlemen, there's no use fighting against such facts as these. If you can possibly get the Universal service, grab it NOW! It is so far the best that there's no room for argument about it!

"THE MASTER KEY"

Not the CHEAPEST Serial

"THE MASTER KEY" is the most massive, the MOST EXPENSIVE serial ever made. Naturally, it isn't the cheapest. You will have to pay extra money for it, but you won't mind because (a) we didn't mind paying tremendous extra amounts on the production cost of every reel and (b) that extra expenditure has resulted in a picture that will get you EXTRA PROFITS. And you don't mind paying for extra profits! So cheerfully pay whatever figure your exchange man must ask because of "MASTER KEY'S" immense production cost, and be thankful that it's not the cheapest serial BUT THE GREATEST!

Greatest, because John Fleming Wilson (its author) turned in a story that he frankly thought we couldn't produce as a film. Mr. Wilson honestly didn't think that we would undertake to put "THE MASTER KEY'S" feats, thrills and realism into an actual motion picture, where all those elements would have to be "acted out"—genuinely portrayed, thrill for thrill, stunt for stunt! When we did undertake to find the directors and actors who could do such a play, AUTHOR WILSON WAS THE MOST SURPRISED MAN IN THE WORLD. And when with the "first print" of Reel One, we proved to him that we had visualized his thrill-masterpiece, Mr. Wilson was so fascinated that we had to run that reel for him again and again!

But the GREATEST!

The wonderful acting of Robert Leonard and Ella Hall completely captivated Author Wilson. He said that he found in them the exact types of hero and heroine he tried to describe in "THE MASTER KEY." He said that we had reproduced his entire weird theme WITH MORE REALISM THAN HIS WRITTEN STORY DID. Since there is a difference between writing of a thing AND PRODUCING IT IN ACTUAL MOTION PICTURES you will appreciate with Mr. Wilson, Universal's feat! "THE MASTER KEY" appears in fifteen weekly numbers. The leading newspaper of America prints the story. "THE MASTER KEY" starts when "TREY O' HEARTS" stops—SOON. He Coupled Up the Newspapers with the "Movies"

He placed the "Adventures of Kathlyn" in newspapers throughout the country.

His latest great successes are "Lucille Love" and the "Trey O' Hearts."

For two years he was syndicate manager of the Chicago Tribune and also its Sunday Editor. Then, he made newspaper stars of Lillian Russell and Laura Jean Libby; he syndicated the political-writings of Finley Peter Dunne and Sam Blythe; he secured national audiences for Jim Corbett and "Mr. Dooley." To cut a long list short, the greater number of important new features in American journalism have been nationalized by A. P. Robyn.

He is now retained by the A. P. Robyn Syndicate to specialize as an aid to Motion Picture Producers.

The newspapers know he has no use for dead ones. He has kept their respect for his endorsements by giving them service.

If you have an important idea for a feature, confer with him about exploiting it. If you have a "big" film and want big audiences, let his company cooperate with your publicity department.

"The Walls of Jericho"

Picturized from the James K. Hackett success produced at the Hackett Theatre, New York.

The story is a modernization and a practical application of the biblical story, "When the priests blew with their trumpets, the walls of Jericho fell down flat." This masterpiece of dramatic literature is a powerful screen vehicle for

EDMUND BREESE

Lately starred on Broadway in "The Master Mind" and remembered as the original John Ryder in "The Lion and the Mouse."

In "The Walls of Jericho," as Jack Frobisher, the rich Australian sheep raiser who marries a noblewoman, he cries, tearing down the walls obscuring his wife's heart and soul: "I've been poor, foolish Jack, who didn't play cards, or waltz. But the first fop who came along, the first smirking dandy, who could whisper and ogle and tell you a tit-bit of scandal, he was amusing and pleasant. He thought it right that you should lose hundreds at cards and spend a fortune on dress. Your brother seduces a girl—you are indignant with me because I befriend her. The people around you—the poor, the helpless, the sick—to these you give never a thought. You are a peer's daughter, sent into the world to enjoy yourself, have a good time with Dallases round to fiirt with. It's been pleasure, pleasure, pleasure from morning till night, from one year's end to another. Well, I say to Hell with all this! You are my wife, not my mistress. I want a mate and a partner. We'll leave this rotten life. We'll go back to Nature, and start things over again."

The OLD FOGEY

A 3-part American drama made by Pathé. The story of a circus man who is loved by everybody but a lion, and of a girl who loves him, and of a man who loves the girl. Here is a most unusual plot played amidst most unusual surroundings. The fogey's faith is hard to shake, but once shaken it causes an upheaval. From faith to betrayal, from a child at the circus to a lion in the hills, love, adventure, theft, jealousy, conflict and the redemption of a woman. The novelty and excitement of this film sweep a big thrill through every audience. 1-3-6 sheet posters.

A Soldier's Duty

Three-part drama. Patriotism ahead of love. Duty ahead of life. That's the attitude of this soldier—that's why he sacrifices his own love for a woman and gives up his life as a spy. It's a mighty strong story, well played but we must not overlook the exceptional backgrounds of wild Swedish scenery, nor the way they're photographed. 1-3-6 sheet posters.

Whiffles Has a Toothache

An uproar in 1 reel. The only Whiffles has trouble with a tooth and with a dentist, yes and with his employer and also the police. You could tell it was a comedy for blocks.

The Perils of Pauline

Ask anyone what they think of when you mention motion pictures. Ten to one it's the "Perils." That's because Pauline has come to represent the best of what one can expect in photo play. Love, adventure, romance, thrills—she leads the field, and she's known and liked by everybody.

"THE NAKED TRUTH IS THE BEST PICTURE THAT EVER PLAYED MY THEATRE"

Says Wm. H. Jenner, manager of the $150,000.00 Vista Theatre, 47th and Cottage Grove Ave., Chicago.

Mr. Jenner is one of the most representative exhibitors in Chicago. He plays the best and only the best and he played "The Naked Truth" to four capacity shows October 2nd!

Little wonder that he's an enthusiastic booster for Lyda Borelli and "The Naked Truth"!

It is only one of many testimonials we have received from numerous wide-awake exhibitors all over America who have played "The Naked Truth."

Received $20,000.00 for her work!

Lyda Borelli received $20,000.00 for her work in "The Naked Truth." If she were not a rare genius with something very wonderful to offer, she could not command a figure so extraordinary. When you see this enchanting twenty-two-year-old girl in her greatest success you will realize why the producers met her at her own terms.

"THE NAKED TRUTH" is founded on the famous French novel by Henry Bataille. It's a story of a woman's surpassing love and its disillusionment—a story of infinite pathos beautifully told.

"THE NAKED TRUTH" is in FIVE PARTS. It was first presented at The New Candler Theatre, New York, where its record-breaking success was freely predicted by Manhattan's best known critics, who, in the words of The Chicago Tribune, "saw in Lyda Borelli a new quantity in filmdom."

Let "The Naked Truth" make YOUR new record

All exhibitors who have played "THE NAKED TRUTH" agree that the title is magnetic. It brings 'em in. The paper is especially attractive. Slides, heralds and a complete line of publicity matter will help a whole lot in making that new record. Why not make your arrangements today?

THE PINES OF LORY

A Dramatized Version of the Novel of Same Name, by J. A. MITCHELL

The coastwise steamer "Maid of the North" was about to leave for Montreal when Mr. Townsend, recognizing Patrick Boyd among the passengers, presented him to Elinor Marshall. They were both bound for Patrick's home where Elinor was to pay a visit to a school friend before proceeding to Montreal to become a nun. In due time they were landed, but the steamer that night became a total wreck. However, they were not landed at Montreal, but on some mysterious island, where they find a house fully provisioned, but unoccupied and in the garden the dead owner sitting upright on a settee. They bury the body in the garden, seek to make a raft and escape. Boyd is lost overboard and swept to sea, but subsequently turns up. Meanwhile Elinor almost becomes a raving maniac by loneliness. She is finally rescued and Boyd appears again when all are made happy once more.

Facts and Comments

THE weekly change in the big motion picture theaters has, on the whole, proven quite successful. There is one thing that should never be forgotten by the manager of a theater with large seating capacity and a weekly change. Weak pictures hurt him and his theater much more than the theater with a daily change. The public which is used to the daily change makes an allowance for an occasional lapse in quality. It does not expect half a dozen masterpieces every day. It is quite different with the public which patronizes the big motion picture theater and has accustomed itself to a weekly change. Here quality is expected once a week and any failure even if it comes but once in three months is hotly resented. Weak pictures immediately alienate such an audience. There is logic in this. Where but fifty-two changes are needed in a year the excuse for weak pictures is much less than in the case of the man who changes every day in the year. Nor are the weak pictures always to be blamed on the manager who is often at a loss where to get his next strong picture. More than ever we need quality films.

NEWSPAPERS in New York and other cities report that "moving picture concerns have offered from eighty thousand to a hundred thousand dollars" to a woman who is under indictment for a notorious capital crime. This vast sum of money is to be presented to the woman if she will "pose as the central figure of the murder when it is put on the reel." A certain portion of the press persists in this howling dervish style of journalism whenever motion pictures get into the news. With a full appreciation of the able fiction writers now purveying the "war news" to a bewildered world this piece of prevarication is entitled to high rank in the literature of Ananias, Baron Munchausen, Sindbad the Sailor, etc. We should like to have a talk with the inventor. He might turn out to be a first class scenario writer for fairy tales.

AS WE gaze about us we see very respectable sums of money invested in new producing efforts. We of course wish all these enterprises success and long life. We earnestly hope that quality will not be neglected in this astounding increase of quantity. A mere increase of quantity might in the present state of methods of distribution prove embarrassing to the producers and we fear not really profitable to anybody. The tendency in the last twelve months or more has been toward overproduction. Exhibitors with fine houses and a first-class clientele are at their wit's end to sustain quality in their program. They are confronted with a mass of new material which reflects little artistic quality, in fact little of anything except the enthusiasm of the producer and his financial supporters. Optimism is a good thing, but there is such a phenomenon as an excess of optimism.

SLOWLY but surely it seems to dawn upon the warring powers in Europe that the kinematograph as a truthful recorder of events is entitled to respect. Some of the obstacles placed in the path of the camera man have seemingly been removed and the possession of even a motion picture camera is no longer deemed a capital offense. Not only will public opinion be influenced by the kinematograph far more than by the printed page but the writing of the history of the war will be made much easier by the indisputable evidence of the camera.

WE wonder how many patrons of the average motion picture theater realize that the exhibitor himself is the best and most effective censor of the films they see. He ought to be the only censor because he is the person most interested in having a clean show. Moreover, he is the one man who knows the peculiarities of his audience. Many things which might be deemed perfectly proper in one theater will be wholly unacceptable in other theaters. It all depends on the neighborhood. This is especially true of war-films, of which there is a great abundance just now. No man can exist long as an exhibitor without learning the art of gauging the tastes and demands of his audience. Hence it is pretty safe to entrust the exhibitor with the right of altering and amending wherever in his judgment such processes are called for.

IN spite of temporary setbacks, the educational film is distinctly advancing. We notice that the number of churches and schools looking for motion pictures of an educational nature is constantly increasing. On the religious side we see that the various denominations begin to specialize in pictures suitable for entertainment, education and propaganda. This is a healthy sign, because it foreshadows the introduction of system into the making and selecting of educational films. System is what the educational film needs most.

The War Tax and the League

[By W. Stephen Bush.]

THERE is every likelihood that the war tax measure will be in the hands of the President before this article reaches the reader. As finally agreed upon by the special sub-committee of the finance committee of the Senate, the portion of the text relating to taxes on theaters reads as follows:

"Proprietors of theaters, museums and concert halls, where a charge for admission is made, having a seating capacity of not more than 250, shall pay $25; having a seating capacity of more than 250 and not exceeding 500, shall pay $50; having a seating capacity exceeding 500 and not exceeding 800, shall pay $75; having a seating capacity of more than 800, shall pay $100."

The tax on motion picture theaters seems to have been proposed at the very last moment and there was but little time for the opponents of such a tax to make their influence felt. It must be said in common justice to the league, its members and its officials, that they acted with commendable promptitude once the danger of a tax was realized. The president of the league was on the ground at the earliest possible moment fortified with solid arguments and the support of leading members in the Senate which he had power to secure. He, and others likewise interested in their opposition to the proposed war tax on theaters, found a somewhat strong sentiment in favor of a very substantial tax, not only upon theaters, but also upon producers of motion pictures. Fortunately the chairman of the sub-committee had been addressed both by letter and in person by prominent men of his home state who recently engaged in the exhibition of motion pictures. The president of the league made it very plain to the Senators with whom he came in contact that the league was a powerful body represented in every state and strongly opposed to this tax. It had been proposed originally to levy a fixed tax of $100 on every moving picture theater regardless of seating capacity. This tax was eventually changed into a graduated tax as set forth above.

One of the most interesting and significant phrases of the struggle against the imposition of this tax was the prevailing opinion that the manufacturers of motion pictures ought to be taxed. It was even proposed by some prominent men both in the House and in the Senate to exempt the exhibitor and to put the tax on the manufacturer. It is greatly to the credit of the league and its representatives at Washington that they opposed such a tax. They pointed out to the statesmen advocating it that a tax of this character would eventually have to be borne by the exhibitor.

It is believed in many quarters that a minimum tax of $10 for theaters of less than one thousand seats and a maximum tax of $100 for theaters of more than one thousand seats might have been secured if more time had been given to the organized exhibitors to make themselves heard. The taxing act specifically provides that chautauquas and lecture lyceums shall be exempt from taxation under this act. This shows that Congress was inclined to heed an appeal for the educational influence of motion pictures.

As it is, the prompt and timely action of the league has saved many thousands of dollars to the exhibitors all over the country. It has thus proved its title to the confidence of exhibitors and this confidence ought to result in a substantial support of the aims and purposes of the league. Had there been such a national bureau of information as the president of the league is planning and wishing for, the warning from Washington would have come to headquarters in plenty of time to allow of a long, vigorous and successful opposition to this tax. The watching of legislation affecting moving pictures, whether at Washington or at any of the state capitols ought to be one of the objects of such a bureau of information. It is an object which could easily be secured and would be of the utmost value to the cause of the exhibitor.

The Moving Picture World earnestly hopes that the next six months will show a very substantial growth of power and membership in the National League of Exhibitors. While on this subject it is well to point out that the exhibitor, except in rare cases, has no community of interest with theatrical managers. It is believed, not without reason, that the theatrical managers gained a good deal for their cause by assuming to represent motion picture interests. The motion picture interests gained nothing in this transaction. One cannot read the text of the bill without feeling that a sharp distinction should have been maintained before the National Legislature, between theaters and motion picture houses. It will be noted that the tax is imposed on: "Proprietors of theaters, museums and concert halls." We know, of course, from the declaration of the committee that they mean to include motion picture theaters in this provision. Such would not have been the case if the distinction between the motion picture house and the regular theater had been more sharply emphasized. In a subsequent paragraph of the measure, a tax of only $10 is imposed on "proprietors or agents of all other public exhibitions or shows for money not enumerated in the provisions of the section." If one reads these two paragraphs: First, the provision of a graduated tax for "proprietors of theaters, museums and concert halls" and then the section to the effect "Proprietors or agents of all other public exhibitions or shows for money not enumerated in this section shall pay $10," one is tempted to claim that the motion picture theater is to come under the latter section.

To sum up: The League has won a great victory for the exhibitors of the country at a time when the organization was not at its strongest, having been much weakened by internal strife. Had the League been as strong as it should be and as in the future, no doubt it will be, it would have been in a position to make it plain to the legislators that its interests and the interests of theatrical managers were not identical in this case. Let this be a lesson for the future. The exhibition of motion pictures has grown to be a calling large enough and important enough to have distinct interests of its own.

In the consideration of any problem affecting exhibitors of motion pictures none but motion picture men should be put on guard. What strength and power the organization possesses today and will possess in the future ought to be exercised for exhibitors and for exhibitors only. The new president of the league is in thorough accord with this policy. The league is now rapidly reviving all through the country and when it has attained its full measure of strength it will know how to assert the exhibitor's point of view. The position of the regular theater before the law is one thing and the position of the motion picture theater is quite another. It is easy to conceive a situation where the interests of the two are not only separate and distinct but even conflicting.

We sincerely believe that the exhibitors of motion pictures are far closer to the public than the managers of any other amusement enterprise and are therefore much more likely to receive the consideration due to them.

Where Are We Now?

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

THERE is no art in moving pictures," says one of our magazine writers. I am tempted to give his name, but my purpose might be misunderstood. He is a very clever writer—but it is quite customary for men to pronounce judgment on a subject that they have not closely investigated and do not wholly comprehend. From another writer, who who is known all over the world, known and respected for sincerity of purpose, I heard a comment to which I could reply in person. "I have always detested moving pictures," remarked the fearlessly candid one. "Suppose," I answered, "one were to judge your own art by a few examples. That they may be of poor quality does not argue against the art itself, it being one of expression. It depends entirely upon what is expressed and how it is treated."

We must be generous to the millions who do not care for moving pictures, for right in our midst, among producers, playwrights and critics, there may be found a lack of clear vision as to what moving pictures should be. I was impressed from the beginning, like many others, that the range of subjects that could be entertainingly and profitably visualized on the screen was practically without limit. Look at the field! Phases of war that no pen could picture. Problems of sociology, business and government. Questions of science, religion and philosophy. History, travel and description; sports, recreations and outdoor life; expositions of character, narratives of place, historical romances; tales of adventure, of mystery, of crime, and all the wide range of other arts may be visualized with pleasure for the people and profit for the business men, because the picturing goes straight to the mind and heart without intervention of words.

So vague are general impressions on this subject, even among highly intelligent people, that I have iterated and reiterated for years that moving pictures should be considered as a language, especially as a means of communication between author and public. They do not constitute a language in ordinary acceptance of that term, but to grasp their full significance one might as well so designate them. Language is a power of expressing thought, and so are moving pictures. Consider them as a medium, through which we convey ideas entertaining or instructive or both. With that obstacle to clear comprehension of the purpose of moving pictures once out of the way, all those now using them or abusing them could be more easily informed as to what stage of development they have reached. The main question seems to be what we are doing with this language and how are we doing it.

Progress in the scientific department has reached a point with well established concerns where quality is almost taken for granted. Reviewers who tell us that "the photography is good" might think it worthy of comment that the words of this article are spelled correctly. That is stretching it a little, but the carefully edited film of today presents few scientific errors deserving special notice. As to the artistic treatment of a screen portrayal, that is quite another matter, but the main purpose of criticism is not to pick out minor flaws in a production. There are too many serious shortcomings in the treatment of the new art for us to dwell on trivialities. As to the principal fault, it was keenly noted by the son of a great stage dramatist. "They lack soul," he said of a line of five-reel photodramas. "They give us the physical structure without the vital principle." That seems to be where we "are" in an enormous number of instances.

Among the many stories visualized on the screen, there now and then appears one which holds the audience tense and arouses profound emotion. Not only is the physical structure in that play but the spirit as well. It seems to me that evidence of soul in structure is of high importance, yet we rarely hear its presence or absence remarked. What a comment—that of the dramatist's son! "They give us the physical structure without the vital principle." If our producers would only see with that clear vision, rather than occupy themselves so exclusively with form and scientific treatment, they might stimulate an advance in our development that would crowd picture exhibitions to overflowing. The first thing that a capable adapter of novels or stage plays for screen presentation considers is, "What is the spirit and significance of this story?" In handling a character—"What is there in the soul of this person that bears heavily on the outcome of the plot?" Not the action, but the motive that brings about that action is the essential.

It is sometimes amusing to look at the passing crowd in a strange city, but we do not know why people are doing this or that and care almost as little. The movement of people in a "play of action" may be mildly interesting, but it becomes of vital interest when we are brought into sympathetic relation with them through skilful characterization. Every author knows that he must build up a personality in his principals before he can expect to make hearts throb with emotion when an intense moment arrives. Yet producers still cut out the vitality of performers and present them as little more than manikins. Their legs and arms and bodies move in accord with the requirements of a situation, but the audience senses only a mild interest in such movements. Movements should convey meaning and have motive that quickens appreciation of the subject matter.

So it happens that many intelligent people fail to grasp the significance of this new art. They see a few meaningless examples and go away completely disgusted. They will change their minds in the course of time, but, meanwhile, it is up to us to consider our own deficiencies, to discuss them frankly, and to remedy them as best we may. Our trouble is a tendency to concentrate upon physical structure. We can continue to do that and yet open up the lens, or broaden our scope so as to take in the vital principle as well. It is not so much a question of this kind of play or that kind of play, this dimension or that dimension, this method of construction or that method, for audiences enjoy a variety of form and treatment. Does the play make us feel? Is its body throbbing with warm blood? Is it animated by purpose, motive, or ideas? Has it depth of thought or intensity of feeling, if it is above farce comedy?

Farce comedy is all right when it is really funny, and it deserves a place in the general assortment, but it has the effect of candy as an exclusive diet. It is not included in these comments for obvious reasons—it is a law unto itself. Farce, however, is tremendously benefited by deft touches of humorous characterization. It is the human touch that breaks through the shell of the pessimist. We are inclined to laugh at our own weakness when exhibited by some other fellow, so to attempt farce without a spark of the essential vitality is about as perilous as trying to tango in a row boat. We seem to have arrived at a perfection of structure in serious plays which warrants our giving all moving pictures a definite reason for being. When we do—when the gods work their miracles—the charm of this new art may be universally recognized and as universally loved.

A Motion Picture Triumph

The Story of a Motion Picture Entertainment in the Throne Room of the Vatican—The Late Pontiff Pius X., Great Dignitaries of the Church and the Sisters of the Pope Made Up the Audience—How a Clever Young American Obtained Motion Pictures of the Pope and of the Vatican.

By W. Stephen Bush.

DID you know that within the last few months of his life the late Pontiff Pius X. was the chief spectator at a motion picture entertainment? And where do you suppose the stage was set or rather "the screen was stretched"? Even in the Vatican, in the historic Papal throne-room. It was the first time that the whirr of the conquering machine was heard in such exclusive precincts. To sweep away your doubts we print the pictures of the room, taken just before the Pope entered. We give you a facsimile of the program, beautifully engrossed by hand and held by the Pope all during the entertainment. The sisters of the Pope were part of the distinguished audience. How did the Pope like the pictures? He clapped his hands, cried "Bravo," and congratulated the young Californian who had so successfully made himself Special Exhibitor to the Papal Court. Before I tell the rest of the story I have to turn the spotlight on the aforesaid Californian He is James Slevin, well known through his former connections with Pathe and the American-Eclair.

James Slevin.

The Story of Slevin.

Perhaps you have an idea that they made a specialty at the Vatican of inviting cameramen and operators to come and help themselves and that the Pope is interrupting private audiences to pose for the screen. Well, you would not be alone in holding this optimistic but hopelessly wrong idea. The approaches to the Vatican are figuratively strewn with the wrecked hopes of ambitious kinematographers. These latter have come from every part of the inhabited globe, always bringing with them strong letters of recommendation from bishops and archbishops attesting that they were faithful sons of the Church and good cameramen. It was finally found necessary to draw up a stereotyped form of polite refusal. Nor was the refusal always polite. It is said that one firm, well known both here and abroad, offered a very large sum of money for the privilege of enjoying just for a few days the freedom of the camera in and about the Vatican. The offer was declined and when the persistent emissaries of the firm began to camp on the trail of cardinals they were threatened with severe ecclesiastical penalties.

Slevin, too, laid siege to the Vatican. In fact he maintained the siege for something like two years, withdrawing occasionally for reinforcements. It was the most diplomatic, the most patient and the most scientific siege in the long history of sieges. It took him but little time to penetrate the first line of defenses. Slevin has skill and a winning way. After weeks of waiting he succeeded in obtaining the privilege of an audience with Cardinal Merry del Val, who was Secretary of State under Pius X. The stipulation was that the audience was to last not longer than a minute at the most. This space of time would scarcely allow of any statement of details, and Slevin was really groaning under a load of details. It looked as if the audience would consist of a polite inquiry after Slevin's health and under favorable conditions, possibly, a passing reference to the state of the weather.

Cardinal Merry del Val Helps.

I cannot characterize Slevin better than by setting down the fact that the interview exceeded the scheduled limit by just about an hour. Other interviews followed, and before long Rome saw the stalwart, handsome young American riding about Rome with the Papal Secretary of State, chatting and laughing in typical American fashion. The Cardinal, whose mother was a native of Belfast and who speaks English with absolute perfection, evidently enjoyed the society of the young "forestiero." Never a word did Slevin say in these enjoyable days of any plan to film either the Vatican or the Pope. He arranged motion picture shows for the benefit of the poor children of Rome, in whom Cardinal Merry del Val takes such a kindly and charitable interest. He met a lot of influential people who took an immediate liking to the young man. Slevin has just turned thirty and looks a good deal less than that. To ordinary observers Slevin must have seemed just a pleasant idler with a hobby for photographic work. Everybody was willing to encourage him. The fact of the matter was that Slevin was burning large quantities of midnight oil. Many a day when he was supposed to dabble and to dally he was gazing about in the solitude of the Colosseum or the Forum working on his speech to the Cardinal. He wanted the Cardinal to help him in getting into the Vatican with his projection machine and to secure the Pope for an audience. The opportune moment for the appeal came. Slevin must have seemed inspired as he lauded the motion picture to the Cardinal, for the latter granted all Slevin asked and practically volunteered to become master of ceremonies at the entertainments which, as I reported before, took place in the throne-room of the Vatican.

The Appeal to His Holiness.

Here then the threads of my story meet again. The Pope was delighted with the picture. In a fatherly way he laid his hands on Slevin's head and said something complimentary about "those fine Americans." Right here Slevin made the speech of his life.

The Late Pope, Pius X.

"I have shown your Holiness the four corners of the earth," cried the young Demosthenes from the Far West. "I have spoken to your Holiness in a language that seems a second Miracle of the Pentecost. Three hundred million of your flock ardently desire to see you. You cannot leave this small dominion which remains of St. Peter's patrimony, but I can bring your image, true to life, to all the members of your great flock. I am emboldened to request, I feel almost as if I had the right to demand that your Holiness allow me to work this Miracle of the Pentecost." A lot more just as good followed.

It was a pretty speech, a very pretty speech. The Pope must have liked it as well as he liked the entertainment, because the very next day he sent his picture with an autograph to Slevin and a few days later Slevin was made a "commendatore" of the Order of St. Gregory, which gave him the right to wear one gorgeous decoration on his breast and another one around his neck, not to mention the sword and the uniform. It was likewise intimated to him that there was "very little chance for the present" to film either the Vatican or the Pope. It looked like an orderly retreat at best. Slevin, however, is a poor retreater. He stayed on. He took motion pictures of the Cardinal and his boys and also other motion pictures of pagan Rome and Christian Rome, etc., etc. Then he withdrew. Note the difference between withdrawing and retreating. In the meantime others came and renewed applications for kinematographic privileges in the Vatican, whereupon the authorities ordered a second edition of the polite refusals. A little time elapsed—just enough to allow Slevin to get back to America and strengthen his lines of communication—and one fine day Slevin reappeared in the Eternal City.

Victory Came at Last.

A sympathetic friend pretty high in the councils of the Vatican asked him whether he had any hopes of accomplishing his object and, without waiting for an answer, urged him to abandon them and think of them only in connection with the snows of last winter. Slevin returned the cordial shake of the hand and stammered his gratitude for the advice. Just about two weeks afterwards he took his first picture of a Papal audience in the Court of Saint Damascus and then came his meetings with the Pope in the gardens of the Vatican and the Pope's consent that he use the camera upon condition that no posing would be expected and that only a few pictures would be taken. The thought of letting the millions of the faithful see the head of the church had worked on the will of the pontiff; he saw the possibilities of the second Miracle of the Pentecost and hence these motion pictures, whose value as an historic record can scarcely be exaggerated. The pictures of the Pope are but a few; of the scenes of the Vatican and of ceremonies in the Vatican there are more. As no artificial light could be used some of these scenes are not entirely satisfactory. The pictures of the lobbies, of the gardens and gates of the Vatican, the scenes in the Court of Saint Damascus, of the Swiss Guard and the Noble Guard are good. The pictures show not only the architectural and historic beauties of the great shrine of Saint Peter's, but give a most interesting and delightful glimpse of the life around the ancient fane. The pictures of ancient Rome and of the great churches of Rome are fair.

NEW THEATER ORDINANCE FOR TARENTUM.

Acting upon a suggestion of President Denny, the ordinance committee of Tarentum, Pa., Council will shortly prepare a new ordinance governing theaters, etc. The present ordinance is considered lax in many respects, especially as regards the safety of patrons. The ordinance will be drafted and presented to the council at the next regular session.

GOVERNMENT USING PICTURE MACHINES.

That the practical value of the motion picture is thoroughly appreciated by the various departments of the United States Government has been amply proved by the use made of it in many ways. No departments make more extensive use of the screen, however, than do those of the Army and Navy. In those two departments alone, there have been installed over sixty Powers Cameragraph motion picture projection machines. They have been placed at West Point and at Annapolis, in the principal army posts throughout the country, and on a number of battleships, where they are used not only for entertainment purposes, but for instruction in military and naval tactics. Among the most recent of these installations have been machines on the battleships Utah and Montana.

Conferees Agree on War Tax

Report to Be Submitted to Both Houses Will Increase the Imposition on Theaters Over the Senate Schedule.

THE conferees of the House of Representatives and the Senate on the war tax measure came to an agreement Wednesday night. Under it the sum assessed on theater owners is increased over the schedule as it passed the Senate. Instead of a minimum of 300 seats it now reads 250, and a theater of this size will pay $25; up to 500 (instead of 600, as previously), the tax is $50; from 500 to 800 (instead of 1,000) it is $75, and all houses having a seating capacity of more than 800 pay the full tax of $100.

The increase in the tax over the sum reported by the Senate is a distinct disappointment to those who have been working for a lowering of the amount imposed on the amusement industry. To Fulton Brylawski, vice-president for the District of Columbia of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, goes the credit for the suggestion of a tax lower than the $100 flat reported in the original House bill. The amendment adopted by the Senate was practically that submitted by Mr. Brylawski. Also in the fight was President Pearce of the National League, who worked among the members of Congress and sent telegrams to the representatives of the League in many states urging pressure on the Congressmen.

The United Managers' Protective Association, of this city, an organization but recently formed, entered the fray. Ligon Johnson, the general counsel of the association, sent to every exhibitor in the country circulars urging the necessity of getting in touch with Congressmen. All owners of legitimate theaters were importuned to do likewise. Through Mr. Johnson's initiative the trades unions affected by the bill took strong action. There were the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes and the Federation of Musicians among others. The president of the former organization not only in person wrote to every Congressman, but circularized the two thousand local branches of his organization asking co-operation.

At the present writing there is every reason to believe that the measure as it affects motion picture theaters will receive the signature of the President in the form indicated in the opening paragraph.

PITTSBURGH MEN WRITE TO PRESIDENT.

The Moving Picture Protective Association of Pittsburgh held a meeting in the Olympic Theater, at which the secretary was notified to send communications protesting against the proposed war tax. Letters were forwarded to President Wilson, Senators Oliver and Penrose and Joseph H. Thompson, attorney. This was sent to President Wilson:

"At a mass meeting of the Moving Picture Protective Association, held at the Olympic Theater, this city, recently, the members instructed me to write and ask that the national tax of $100 be not imposed on the moving picture shows, as they now pay $120 to $150 per year local license, and $26 per year state tax.

"This is the poor man's show, and if we are compelled to pay this additional tax we will then, in turn, be compelled to charge a larger admission fee, and after a bad summer's business it will be the means of closing up many small houses.

"Kindly advise Representative Underwood of this fact, and just remember you are taking the laboring man's little pleasure away from him by closing up the nickelodeon or five-cent show.

"There are about 2,500 moving picture shows in the State of Pennsylvania alone, and they want to know the position our President and Senators are taking in regard to their shows, which will be announced on their screens.

"Awaiting your kind reply,we beg to remain,

"Yours very respectfully,

"THE MOVING PICTURE PROTECTIVE ASSN.,

"A. J. HANNA, Secretary."

SUGGESTIONS ON THE PROPOSED TAX OF $100 ON THEATERS.

If you include moving picture shows as theaters it will invoke a considerable hardship on about 60 per cent. of the picture show houses. Take for instance, a little show with 180 to 300 seats, right in Pittsburgh, the majority of which operate from 7 to 10.30 p. m., and earn a living only—a tax or payment of $100 would put them out of business.

We believe your committee does not understand the small show proposition. Now if you were to tax theaters of 900 seats or over $100, and from 500 to 900 seats, $50; and all others $10 to $25, proportionately, it would mean a fair adjustment to the small theater, whose earnings are not over $25 to $40 per week. We believe you gentlemen should consider this matter. Any information you desire, please write us.

Yours very truly,

CINCINNATI CONDEMNS WAR TAX.

At a rather interesting special meeting of the Cincinnati branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, held at the Sinton Hotel with Fred L. Emmert presiding, several important matters were taken up and passed on. The organization expressed strong disapproval of the proposal to tax motion picture houses for the benefit of the Federal Government, while the proposed home rule amendment to the Ohio Constitution providing for the regulation of the liquor traffic at the option of the several cities and towns of the State was indorsed.

Swanson and Engle Sell Universal Stock

Entire Holdings Pass to a Buyer Acting in the Interests of the Company—Everybody Satisfied.

WILLIAM H. SWANSON and Joseph Engle have disposed of their holdings in the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. The ostensible purchaser is Otto Schwartz, who has been described as a New Orleans and Chicago banker. There is substantial reason for the belief, however, that the name represents a broker right here in New York. The sum involved is said to approximate three-quarters of a million dollars. The number of shares of voting power transferred represents about 25 per cent. of the total.

There has been much speculation as to the identity of the party or parties for whose benefit the purchase was made. It can be said, on what seems to be ample authority, that the stock was bought in the interests of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. It may be added, too, that the litigation which circled about the control of the company in months past is in a fair way to be discontinued, that the Universal will continue under the direction of the same officers as now guide its affairs, that definite plans for expansion will surely be executed, and that altogether there is a spirit of complete harmony prevailing among the stockholders of the company.

When P. A. Powers was asked as to the significance of the recent transfer of Universal stock he said that he thought any statement regarding the Universal company should come from the president or the secretary of the concern. Robert H. Cochrane, the secretary of the Universal, is out of town attending the funeral of his mother. In his absence President Laemmle absolutely refused to say a word in regard to the subject.

World Film-Liebler Alliance

Big Film Corporation Secures Right to Produce Four Important Stage Successes of Recent Years.

An alliance between the World Film Corporation and Liebler & Co. for the purpose of producing certain big successes controlled by the last named concern was one of the big announcements of the week of October 19. The arrangement made provides for the release to the World Film Corporation by the Liebler Company, for photoplay production, of Paul Armstrong's "Alias Jimmy Valentine," "The Renegade" and "The Deep Purple" and Pierre Loki's "A Daughter of Heaven." The Armstrong plays are already being filmed at the World Film plant in Fort Lee and preparations for the picturing of "A Daughter of Heaven" are rapidly being completed.

"Alias Jimmy Valentine" and "The Deep Purple" are particularly well known by theatergoers and great things are expected of the photoplays which are to be made from them. "A Daughter of Heaven" is the big Oriental spectacle which was recently produced by the Liebler Company at the Century theater, New York City, with Viola Allen in the stellar role.

It is announced that all of the productions named will be made upon a most pretentious scale and that the casts will include many of the players who appeared in the several New York companies who had so much to do with making the offerings such big successes.

Lewis J. Selznick's Idea

General Manager of the World Film Corporation Says a Good Picture Is More Valuable on a Second Run Than on a First.

LEWIS J. SELZNICK has been in the film business two years. That's not a long time, as the film business these days goes. It's not exactly a short time, either, from some points of view. It is a short time, however, in which to accomplish the things Mr. Selznick has accomplished. The present executive head of the World Film Corporation has moved fast in the months he has been general manager of that progressive organization. His latest coup—at least, it is the latest at the hour of writing—was to secure the productions of the Dyreda Art Film Corporation. Dyreda, as is well known, is a composite expression of all that is represented in a trade way by Frank L. Dyer, former president of the General Film Company; J. Searle Dawley, foremost producer; J. Parker Read, Jr., successful independent manufacturer. Mr. Selznick naturally feels that his company has been complimented by its latest acquisition. Mr. Dyer goes so far as to say—and he goes a distance when he says anything for publication—that he is pleased himself.

"Our first Dyreda release will be 'One of Millions,'" said Mr. Selznick. "It is a four-part war story, and it will go out November 16. It will be followed by another subject of strong war flavor, 'In the Name of the Prince of Peace.' When Mr. Dyer came in to see me I suggested to him my belief that in fifteen minutes I could convince him we had the goods. It took me thirty as a matter of fact, but at the end of that time he said, 'You have got me.' In the Peerless Studio we consider we have a structure that is the equal of any in the country. We are having remarkable success with the Robert Warwick pictures, and believe we have one of the greatest male moving picture stars in the country. And as to Clara Kimball Young, it is not necessary for me to speak. Everybody who knows pictures knows her pre-eminence on the screen.

"Vivian Martin will be seen for the first time in pictures in 'The Wishing Ring,' which we are releasing November 9. You know she has been leading woman with Lew Field in 'The High Cost of Loving.' I predict that she is going to make one of the big hits. She has a most charming personality; she is dainty, she is beautiful, and best of all, she can act."

"What is this story about the World Film hooking up with Hamburger out in Chicago?" the World man inquired.

"Why," replied Mr. Selznick, "Alfred Hamburger controls a large exchange in Chicago as well as fifteen theaters. My men had refused to do business with Mr. Hamburger, claiming that if we sold to him the exhibitors would take offense on account of his being an exchange man. I sent a representative out there to look over the ground and he brought back a report sustaining our Chicago office. Then it was that I concluded to go there myself. I talked with Mr. Hamburger and with exhibitors, and found it was simply a matter of jealousy on the part of some of the latter. I had no trouble in convincing Mr. Hamburger that our pictures were more valuable on a second run than on the first. It is a fact, and it is not sufficiently understood by the trade at large. A good picture on its first run advertises itself in a community. That publicity is a distinct asset to the exhibitor who shows the subject subsequently, even though his house be just across the street from the first man. Well, Mr. Hamburger signed a contract which means from him to us a minimum payment of $1,500 a week. Yes, we feel pretty good over the transaction.

"Just now we are releasing one feature a week, with an occasional special, such, for instance, as 'The Seats of the Mighty' and 'America.' We are getting ready to release two subjects a week, each of four or five reels, and each month a big production, running from seven to nine reels. These latter, after playing the big circuits, will be cut down to six reels, for showing in the smaller houses. So you think this looks as if the World Film still believes in the feature picture as a going institution, as a lasting one—that the public is not tired of it? It does. Why, only last July I met a prominent officer of a large program corporation and he volunteered the suggestion that my proposition was an absolute joke, that the feature was declining, declining fast. He was wrong.

"I contend that the feature always will be good, the same as a special act in vaudeville. Yes, I have got so much faith in my ideas that arrangements are being made practically to double our releases. Furthermore, you may say this: It was hard for me to convince the film world that I had the right idea of the situation, but I had no trouble in convincing such banking houses as Edward B. Smith & Co. and Huyn, Edey & Co. of New York City and George A. Huyn & Sons of Philadelphia that we had a good business proposition. The exhibition of well-produced popular plays interpreted by good stars means box office receipts for the theater owner. These place the exhibitor in a position to give the public a two-dollar ticket for 10 cents. Our aim is not to put out a lot of pictures, but to place our money on big stuff that will return big rentals.

Lewis J. Selznick.

"We are working out a scheme of co-operation with the exhibitor which gives promise of good results all around. We are placing our brains at the disposal of the showman. If a man wants to do business with us naturally we are curious as to his capacity to fulfill his contracts. We look over his house, size it up, as it were. If his lobby display does not look right we give him the benefit of our experience. We furnish him with booklets describing his theater and also describing our pictures. We induce him to circularize his public. We play up the exhibitor's business. We desire to contribute what forces we can to put him in the position of being able to pay $50 a day for a subject. My belief is that the time is coming when pictures will play a solid week. Of course, a few theaters do now, but there will be more, regardless of the fact that they may be community houses.

"In carrying out my ideas as to artistic paper we have engaged W. N. Wilson, a magazine illustrator. You can see from the drawings I have here what is being done by the World Film. I think you will agree with me the work is not only novel and unusual in the film business, but that it is as attractive as it is artistic. Mr. Wilson is keeping away from old lines and is developing new ones. His designs and creations are bound to be popular. As in our art and publishing departments, so it is in other branches of the work of this company. We are getting away from the old ways, as I said; we are trying to do business not in the orthodox film way, but as other men in other lines do business. It is my intention to give preference at all times to the men that don't know all about the film business. These are the men that can be taught what we want done, and will not try to teach us.

"It is the intention of the World Film Corporation to put into effect about the end of November a profit-sharing plan, which will include all employes from the office boy up. I have been working on the scheme for some time now, and I hope soon to be able to announce the details of the idea."

Flamingo Company Organizes

Announces Its Officers and Forms Alliance With Sawyer, Inc., Chartered Theaters Corporation and Stock Exchange House.

ANNOUNCEMENT of formal organization and election of officers and its plan of operation is made by the Flamingo Film Company. The first meeting of the stockholders and directors was held last week and the election resulted as follows: President, Frederick Upham Adams; vice-president and general manager, H. A. Hallett; treasurer, F. H. Tinker; secretary, A. H. Sawyer; directors, Gilbert Elliott, Charles E. Fay, A. H. Sawyer, F. H. Tinker, H. A. Hallett and Frederick Upham Adams.

With this information comes the announcement that the company is an alliance in which Sawyer, Inc., the Chartered Theaters Corporation and the stock exchange house of Gilbert Elliott & Company are interested, the purpose being the production and distribution of high-class feature comedies in two and three reels. It is also stated that the first releases will be the three winning comedies awarded prizes in the scenario contest recently concluded by the Chartered Theaters Corporation and the Morning Telegraph. The company has also taken over the right and title to all the comedies resulting from that contest.

Speaking of the plans of the Flamingo Company, Secretary Sawyer gave the Motion Picture World this outline: "Believing that there is an insistent demand for a higher standard of motion picture comedies than single-reel farces and burlesque productions, the Flamingo Film Company will seek to satisfy it to the utmost. I do not wish to be understood as expressing by disapproval of so-called 'slap stick' farce, nor for extravaganza or burlesque. I entertain for these classes of production great regard and it would be foolish to say they are unpopular, for they are not. Each has its place in motion picture production and are of value in giving variety to the program of the exhibitors.

"It appears to us that there is a very high place not yet attained for comedies of two, three and even five reels, but which we shall aim to reach. It is an admitted fact that the drama for the screen has advanced to a higher artistic plane than has the film comedy. The effort to present great big themes with all the wealth of scenic effects possible to the camera, to depict startling situations and to make the impossible a reality, have, in a great measure tended to the neglect of photodramas in which the comedy element predominates.

"The first three Flamingo releases will be the admirable comedies written by Mr. McCardell, Miss Sterne and Miss Wells. We believe they will create a profound impression throughout the entire world. There is not a dull moment or a strained situation, in either of the three comedies. They fairly bubble over with amusing situations and each possesses a plot, skillfully woven around interesting personages which will hold the interest and attention of any and every audience. Our plans contemplate at least one multiple comedy each week. In time we expect to give variety to the Flamingo program by interpolating at regular intervals single-reel comedies."

Production will begin next week and it is learned from other sources that Fred Mace, whose reputation as a producer of comedies is well known, will be in charge of the work, assisted by P. C. Hartigan, who was until recently with Pathe.

Sawyer, Inc., will have the distribution of the Flamingo product and the new company's offices will be in the Mecca Building, 48th street and Broadway, New York, on the same floor with the Sawyer concern.

Manufacturers' Association Progresses

Interesting Meeting Held at Hotel Wellington, New York, Tuesday Evening, Oct. 20—Much Enthusiasm Expressed.

PURSUANT to a call issued by the organization committee of the proposed asssociation of manufacturers of motion pictures and accessories there was an interesting meeting of interested persons at the Hotel Wellington on Tuesday evening, October 20. F. J. Rembusch, of Indianapolis, Ind., chairman of the organization committee appointed at Dayton, Ohio, was present and called the meeting to order. Remarks on the movement were made by Joseph Farnham, Tom Moore and Carl Anderson. What was said by these speakers was in the way of explanation touching upon the origin of the proposed organization and what was expected to be accomplished.

Remarks were made by Jesse L. Lasky, Adolph Zukor, Samuel Goldfish, Arthur James, Will Smith, of Nicholas Power Company, and others, in substance to the effect that the plan to hold motion picture trade expositions under the auspices and the direction of the manufacturers themselves was preferable to any other method.

A proposition to proceed with an election of directors and officers of the organization was objected to upon the ground that there should be a more representative meeting of manufacturers, also that the question of membership in the proposed organization had not been definitely settled. It was also pointed out that the committee on organization had not prepared anything tangible to present to the trade.

It was finally decided that Chairman Rembusch should appoint a committe to further canvass the situation and that it be prepared to report in four weeks. The committee appointed consists of Joseph Farnham, W. A. Johnson, Ernest Glanzberg, T. G. Wiley, Will Smith and A. H. Byrd.

Box Office to Release Seventeen Reels

Will Institute Program in Which a Feature Each Week Will Be a Broadway Star in Broadway Play.

THE Box Office Attractions Company is about to institute a program of seventeen reels a week. The brands and the number of reels to be released under each every seven days are the Balboa, of two or three reels; White Star, three reels; Nemo, three reels; Fox Features, four reels; Wonderful Plays and Players, four or five reels. This latter brand will represent the work of Mr. Fox's own organization. The first release of this company, which is designed to produce Broadway stars in Broadway plays, will be "The Walls of Jericho," Alfred Sutro's play of modern society. In this production there will be featured Edmund Breese, the creator of John Burkett Ryder, in "The Lion and the Mouse."

Mr. Fox has opened fourteen exchanges in different parts of the country. He owns and controls twenty-two theaters in New York State and New England. Many of these are noted for their size and elaborateness. It is his intention to put out such pictures as will please the clientele of his own houses, which he considers the best. At work on his subjects are such directors as Frank Powell, lately with Pathe; J. Gordon Edwards, formerly managing producer at the Academy of Music; Edgar Lewis, who directed "The Littlest Rebel"; Lloyd B. Carlton, long time with Lubin, and the director of many of the larger productions of that studio, and George De Carleton.

Mr. Fox has the control of the rights of "A Fool There Was," Porter Emerson Browne's story; "The Idler," by C. Haddon Chambers, the adaptation for which has been made by Roy McCardell; and Israel Zangwill's "Children of the Ghetto," in which Wilton Lackaye will play Reb Schmudl, which character he played in the original production.

NEW MINNEAPOLIS MUTUAL OFFICE.

The Mutual Film Corporation, of Minneapolis, Minn., has secured new offices at 22 North Sixth street, a brand new one-story building in the heart of the business district. The offices are splendidly fitted and furnished and are said to be the finest in the business. Fireproof vault and a fireproof inspection room are features; rest rooms for the employees and a special projection room for the convenience of customers are not to be overlooked. The floor space contains about 4,200 square feet and there is a basement for storage purposes of similar area. Benjamin N. Judell is manager.

The Chines Company of Rome, Italy, announces that Maurice Magre, of Paris, won first prize in the international scenario contest which closed recently. The title of the winning script, which carried with it a cash prize of $5,000, was "The Treasure of Rampsinite." The second prize was captured by Messrs. A. Jondola and J. Diotallevi with "Leonardo Da Vinci." The third, fourth and fifth prizes were awarded as follows: "The Black Christ," by Louis Fest, third prize; "The Sale of Truth," by J. Coste, fourth prize, and "The Nightingale," by L. Montecchi, fifth prize. A number of other scenarios received awards of $100, while a larger quantity were paid for at regular rates.

JESSE L. LASKY GOES TO COAST.

Brenon to Produce for Tiffany

His First Picture Will Be "The Heart of Maryland," with Mrs. Leslie Carter in the Stellar Role.

HERBERT BRENON, whose resignation from the producing forces of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company was announced in The Moving Picture World last week, is to be the head of the production department of the Tiffany Film Corporation. Mr. Brenon's first picture in his new field will be "The Heart of Maryland," with Mrs. Leslie Carter in the leading role of the play in which her name is so closely and intimately associated. The company will leave New York City on Sunday for Los Angeles, where the picture will be made. As leading man, Mr. Brenon has secured William Shay, who has done notable screen work in the last three years. It is of interest to note that for ten years he played in support of Mrs. Leslie Carter. The fact that her former associate is to play the leading male role opposite her is a matter of congratulation to the star actress.

Herbert Brenon.

Mr. Brenon in outlining his new work said he had left his former associates with many regrets, but that he felt his greater opportunities lay in the way of feature production, and his future work would lie in that direction. It was not yet determined whether the company would locate in the West or the East. The settlement of the question would depend to a great extent on the ability to secure in the West the co-operation of the stars they had in mind for featuring. Should it develop that the East presented advantages in this respect a studio would be obtained here. There is a strong possibility that the company may remain in the West for a second production.

Mr. Brenon said that as he had a marked financial interest in the Tiffany company he will now realize what it means to have one eye on the box office. He expressed his belief, however, that artistry counts nowhere more strongly or rather is reflected nowhere more strongly than in the box office. He said that ample capital had been provided for the making of pictures that would hold down Broadway for runs, and that it was his intention to make that sort of productions. It may be worth noting that his "Neptune's Daughter," in which Miss Kellermann was starred, holds a remarkable record for continuous run in a single theater that of Alfred Hamburger's Fine Arts theater, in Chicago, where the picture has now been showing nearly six months.

"I am happy in my new association," said Mr. Brenon on Wednesday. "I have two strong partners, one an amusement man of wide connections, the other a film man of many years' experience. It's a triple alliance I like. I realize it will be a new experience to spend my own money or at least that in which I have so direct an interest. You will forgive me for being full of enthusiasm over my first picture. I went to Baltimore the other day to see 'The Heart of Maryland' on the stage once more. Surely it is a motion picture as it lays.

"I believe at present there is a great demand for popular plays adapted for the screen, but I also believe the day is not far distant when we are going to have the great original stories on the screen and written by men and women as eminent as those now writing for the stage. It is my conviction that the writers of these big stories are going to be compensated not on the flat basis prevailing today, but on a royalty arrangement whereby the author will share in the profits to which he is so certainly entitled. For the present we must move with the tide. All we can do is to try to get better stars and better plays."

Mr. Brenon was the director of one of the first three-reel subjects to be made in America—"Leah the Forsaken." Among his notable productions were "Absinthe" and "Ivanhoe," both four-reel subjects in which King Baggot was starred.

Charles Pathe in New York

Famous French Motion Picture Manufacturer Will Remain for Some Time to Study American Conditions—No Intention to Sell.

ON Sunday, Oct. 18, the American liner New York arrived and among its passengers was Charles Pathe, head of the firm of Pathe Freres, who has come to America to study trade conditions in its relation to the business of his company. He will make an indefinite stay. This is an opportunity that Mr. Pathe has long hoped for and is made possible by the European war, which has put an end, almost, to motion picture operations on the Continent. Finding that his time was not required at the home office Mr. Pathe decided that he could employ it to advantage at the American Pathe plant.

Regarding the rumored sale of the American plant to William Fox, Mr. Pathe emphatically denied that such transfer had been made and more, that it had not even been contemplated or suggested. He believes that the rumor gained credence through the fact that William Fox had leased a portion of the studio room for the production of some of his pictures.

Pushing Fight Against Censorship

Mutual Film Corporation Petitions United States Supreme Court to Advance Its Case Against Ohio.

THE Mutual Film Corporation has filed a brief in which it petitions the Supreme Court of the United States to advance its case against the Industrial Commission of Ohio et al and take it out of its regular order on the docket on account of the special and peculiar circumstances which exist in connection therewith. This case comes to the Supreme Court on an appeal. The case is brought to test the constitutionality, both under the constitution of the United States and of the State of Ohio, of an act passed by the General Assembly of Ohio on April 16, 1913, which created a board of censors of motion picture films.

The brief states that it is of greatest importance, not simply to persons who are engaged in the manufacture, distribution and exhibition of motion picture films, but also to the millions of people in the United States who go daily to see exhibitions, that the question as to whether any government authority can constitutionally impose a censorship of motion picture films should be settled once and for all by the decision of the Supreme Court. It is further stated that similar laws have been passed and are the subject of litigation in Kansas, Pennsylvania and Illinois, and that the Congress of the United States and the legislatures of many states are considering the enactment of similar laws.

UNIVERSAL BOOSTING "BUY A BALE."

Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, is devoting the energies of his organization to helping the cotton raisers of the South in the emergency that has arisen due to the European war. On all releases of the Universal there is an introductory strip of about thirty feet of film showing the weighing of a bale of cotton. With this goes a title urging upon all the necessity to "Buy a Bale of Cotton." Mr. Laemmle is enthusiastic in his desire to aid the cotton raisers. Speaking to a visitor in his office the other day, to whom he had just shown on the screen one of the "Buy a Bale" scenes, the Universal's president said:

"Just estimate, if you can, how much money it would take to buy the equivalent in advertising the Universal is giving to the cotton men. Suppose, for instance, the Universal subjects are shown in six thousand theaters a day and that the average daily attendance at these houses is one thousand. That means six million persons who have put in front of them every day not one reminder but three or four or five to buy a bale of cotton. Why, that means forty-two million a week. It is an illustration of the power of the motion picture. If we are advertising the cotton men we are glad of the chance. It is publicity that can't be bought, yet it is without price."

DAVID HORSLEY GOING WEST.

David Horsley has made arrangements to leave New York for Los Angeles during the first week in November, and will, if present plans prevail, remain on the Coast to take active charge of his California producing companies until the first of next May. Mrs. Horsley and the new Horsley baby (he hasn't been named yet), and Master Stanley Horsley will accompany the Bayonne film magnate in his Western sojourn.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Unscrupulous Stock Promoting Schemes.

THE crafty promoter of things that are dark to the uninitiated is still at work in the moving picture field. Colonel Sellers at his best could not have outdone some of these glib tongued fellows, who write and talk to their intended victims of the millions that are in the moving picture business, as if they were writing or talking of mere dollars.

A cunning feature of the methods pursued by some of the latest of these promoters lies in the fact that they seek men for employment who are prominent in the world of letters, or who have been holding a position of prominence with some of the oldest film manufacturing firms. These names are used to conjure with in the literature sent out to prospective stock purchasers, as the following circular letter, recently sent out by the United Photo-Plays Co. of this city, will show:

We have under contract, Mr. Harry McRae Webster, the man who made the Essanay Company what it is today. It is estimated that, due to Mr. Webster's efforts, the Essanay Company made approximately Two Million Dollars net last year. We are negotiating with several different people for a producing site, and anticipate that we will be producing our own photoplays by January 1, 1915.

Dr. Geo. A. Dorsey, Curator of Anthropology of the Field Museum, accompanied by Chas. Kaufman, expert camera man, and William Menke, world authority on color photography, sailed from San Francisco on the 29th of August for the far east. They carried with them a complete outfit and supplies for one year. Their first picture was taken on board the boat between San Francisco and Honolulu. They were fortunate in being able to film a ship romance. They have been in Japan for the past thirty days and have taken many pictures of wonderful interest, including the complete capture of sperm whales. You will note by the enclosed cablegram they have already developed one mile of fine film. This will be returned to Chicago at the earliest possible moment.

You must know the value, from a money-making standpoint, of films of this character. We will have the advertising value of Dr. Dorsey's name (a man of international reputation) in connection with these films. It is estimated that the six reels taken by Paul Rainey in Africa have netted to date nearly Two Million Dollars. We anticipate that the United Photo-Play Far East expedition will return to us from one hundred to three hundred reels of exceptional and most wonderful pictures. The comparison is obvious. We should make at least Eight Million Dollars net. You may think these figures are too high; but when you realize that the income from the motion picture houses in the United States total something over Four Hundred Million Dollars per annum, we believe that you will readily see that enormous profits are not only possible; but probable.

Our producing plant, as established under the direction of Mr. Webster, should pay alone dividends from twenty-five to fifty per cent. on the entire capitalization of this company. Combine these profits with the profits of the pictures taken by by the United Photo-Plays Far East expedition, and the profits derived from a chain of photo-play houses extending across the continent, and you will arrive at a very fair estimate of the dividends that this company will pay to its stockholders.

Let us reiterate to you that this is your Last Opportunity to become a factor in the third largest business in the world and to derive for yourself a portion of the large profits which we are making and will make.

Among our prominent stockholders in Chicago we might mention Mr. Pratt, Treasurer of the C. & E. I. Railroad; Mr. Thorne, Vice-Pres. of the Montgomery Ward Mail Order House; Mr. Rawson, Financial Secretary to Mr. Spoor; Mr Collins, Manager of the Postal Telegraph Company, and a long list of others. These people have purchased their stock only after a very careful and exhaustive investigation. They bought their stock because they considered this a most unusual opportunity for investment in a going concern.

Note well the ease with which big money is made in the business. Mr. Harry McRae Webster, for example, who recently resigned his position as producer with Essanay, was instrumental in making $2,000,000 in profits for that company in 1913! Not only so, but it is claimed that he made Essanay, in order that the intended victims may hasten to unloose their purse strings. In all justice to Mr. Webster, whom I have known for some time, it must be stated here that, on his own admission, made to me personally, he was ignorant of the fact that such literature was being issued. He lays no claim to the making of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Co., nor to that fabulous $2,000,000.

How well these fellows are posted on the earnings of films! Two million dollars of profits for the Rainey pictures! And how glibly they roll out $8,000,000 net profits for the reels turned out by the United Photo-Play Far East expedition! How craftily they insert that $400,000,000 as the yearly income from moving picture houses in the United States; for are they not going to establish a chain of houses across the continent?

But they are not only crafty, but deliberately misleading in other particulars. Among the prominent stockholders in Chicago whom they mention is Mr. Rawson, financial secretary to Mr. Spoor—mark you, Mr. Spoor; no initials are given. Now it happens that the Mr. Spoor referred to is J. A. Spoor, president of the Chicago Terminal Co. and a big Chicago capitalist, who is closely allied with J. Pierpont Morgan & Co.. The intention was to make the reader believe that the Mr. Spoor referred to was Geo. K. Spoor, president of Essanay, and that his financial secretary thought so well of the scheme that he became a stockholder.

In the list of officers and directors of United Photo-Plays Co., another attempt to deceive the reader is made in the case of Herbert L. Harris, vice-president, who, it is explained, is sales manager of the Essenkay Company, Chicago. Notice how nearly alike are Essenkay and Essanay. Mr. Harris at one time was general salesmanager of the S. & K. Tire Filler Co., which has been defunct for some time.

A trade paper may expose concerns of this kind; but, unfortunately, it does not reach the misguided men and women who buy the stock of such enterprises. Until the big dailies take up the matter the evil will continue.

"Your Girl and Mine" Scores Big Success.

All the Chicago papers devoted considerable space to the first presentation of "Your Girl and Mine," which was given in the Auditorium, Wednesday afternoon, Oct. 14. The occasion was an important one in the history of equal suffrage, and the spacious theater was well filled by spectators interested in votes for women. Intelligent applause greeted the many strong and telling points of the big photomelodrama, my review of which will appear in the next issue.

Miss Kitty Kelly, in the Tribune, wrote the following paragraphs in a lengthy article on the subject and its presentation: "The accomplishment is exceedingly creditable, both propagandically and pictorially, though of the former quality I cannot speak so assuredly as of the latter. I take it, however, from the waves of enthusiasm that greeted each well phrased argument that it carried home the force expected from it.

"It is a series of dramatic pictures of real life, based on actual laws of the country. The purpose is to show the effect of these laws upon women and children. How effective the production was in this respect was learned from remarks of suffragists as the play progressed.

"'When were these laws allowed—in the dark ages? How long ago was it that a husband was permitted to deed away his children?'

"These questions were asked when paragraphs of the statutes or state constitutions were thrown on the screen. The symbolic figure of 'Votes for Women' appeared to show how these statutes might be remedied at every crisis.

"Some of the other defects in laws, as displayed in the suffrage film, were the lack of fire escape protection by greedy landlords; the inability of a wife to control her property; the power of a husband to have control of his children, and the right of a father to collect his children's earnings through the child labor law."

A Tempest in a Teapot.

The A. B. O. Feature Film Company is concerned in a scandal in the state, over which Governor Dunne is much exercised just now. The A. B. O. Company, it is stated, gets its name from the initial letters in the names of Warden Allen, of the state penitentiary, Wm. S. Bastar, promoter of the concern, and D. J. O'Connor, private secretary to Gov. Dunne's confidential adviser, Mr. O'Connell.

Warden Edward Allen is charged with owning twenty-five shares in the A. B. O. Company, which advertised that a film showing the convicts in the penitentiary was obtained by official sanction and produced under the personal direction of Warden Allen. Governor Dunne asserts that the first he heard of the matter was when Mr. Allen wrote him regarding the granting of permission to the A. B. O. Company to film the convicts. The Governor replied that he was unalterably opposed to it unless the prisoners themselves consented. Warden Allen then wrote that the inmates had taken a vote on the matter, which decided in favor of having the pictures taken.

Warden Allen denies that he owns any of the stock of the A. B. O., while O'Connor has given out that, after the pictures were taken, Mr. Bastar said that he was going to organize a $10,000 corporation, but that no money was put up; also that Mr. Bastar had given twenty-five shares to him, and the same number to Warden Allen. Mr. Bastar denies that he gave any stock to Mr. Allen.

S. W. Ford, temporarily in charge of the A. B. O. offices at 17 North La Salle street, accuses a reported who posed as a prospective buyer of state rights of the picture of quoting him wrongly, with regard to the meaning of A. B. O.

The pictures were taken several months ago. Politics, no doubt, is back of the charges.

The Pike's Peak Film Company Formed.

Colorado Springs can boast of a moving picture company all its own, according to the Colorado Springs Gazette. It is known as the Pike's Peak Film Company, is incorporated for $150,000, and practically all the stock is controlled by local capital.

The company is already at work in the studio at 610 North Cascade avenue. The Warner's Features will include the output, as the Pike's Peak Film Company has contracted to produce, as a starter, one three-reel feature and two single-reel subjects every month.

Otis B. Thayer, at one time with the Selig forces, is managing director. At present the acting company numbers eight people. Miss Josephine West, the leading woman, is from Danville, Ky., and has been engaged in photoplay acting for several years. She is regarded as one of the best riders in the profession and western plays are to her liking.

Edward F. Cobb, the leading man, is also a motion picture actor of experience. He and Miss West have appeared in the same productions in various parts of the United States during the last four years.

Major Funkhouser Rouses Ire of Leading Suffragists.

Major Funkhouser, head of Chicago's censor board, took a slash at one of the scenes in the big suffrage picture, "Your Girl and Mine," just before it was presented at the Auditorium Wednesday, Oct. 14, thereby rousing the ire of the ladies concerned in the production. Mrs. Medill McCormick, chairwoman of the congressional committee of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, who has been the leading factor in the production of the subject, criticised the action of the Major as follows:

"Censorship as an institution is medieval and undemocratic. As Major Funkhouser has exercised his power in this particular case, it is preposterous and officious in him to have cut the film. The scene which he has assumed to censure was a representation of one of the most convincing and realistic fights which I have ever seen staged. It showed a woman struggling with a man in the interest of her right. It was a splendid piece of acting, too—none of your stage claptrap about it."

Chicago Film Brevities.

Ashton Stevens, in the Chicago Examiner, paid the following tribute to John Bunny in Funnyland: "He is not as funny as Weber or Field in that ancient game, but he is Bunny, and the children love him, and their parents love their children. Indeed, Mr. Bunny-off-the-screen did so well yesterday and last night that the manager, Lew Weiswell, told me that his next picture star for the legitimate would be Annette Kellerman in all the tricks she has played on sea and shore."

Francis X. Bushman, according to a recent report, is a very lucky man. It is said that he has been left a fortune of $25,000 in a very unusual way. The story goes that the widow of one Marshall Bushman, of Death Valley, called at the Essanay plant recently to see Essanays' popular actor. She stated that her husband, who died a short time ago, had seen a moving picture show in which Mr. Bushman was featured. He immediately declared that the actor was his cousin, whom he had not seen since childhood, and then bequeathed him part of the fortune he had made in mining. Mr. Bushman could not succeed in remembering that he had such a cousin, but he said that he was willing to take the money on a chance. Mrs. Marshall Bushman, it is said, has gone to Mr. Bushman's home in Norfolk, Va., to trace the relationship.

W. C. Quimby, of the W. C. Quimby enterprises, Zanesville, O., called at the World office one day last week. The Quimby enterprises at present include the Quimby Theater in Zanesville, which seats 700 people, and the Jefferson in Fort Wayne, which seats 1,250, besides several smaller houses in Ohio towns. Mr. Quimby reported that business was very good in his chain of theaters. He is at present working on the formation of a circuit of moving picture houses stretching from Pittsburgh to Chicago. The intermediate towns on the circuit will be East Liverpool, O., Steubenville, O., Zanesville, O., Newark, O., Mansfield, O., Lima, O., Fort Wayne, Ind., and LaFayette, Ind. The houses on this circuit will all have a capacity of 700 or over. Mr. Quimby informed me that George Kleine's great feature, "Julius Caesar," will be presented in the Jefferson Theater, Fort Wayne, Oct. 28 and 29. This will be the first American presentation of this great classic.

Colonel Leroy T. Stewart, superintendent of delivery of the Chicago postoffice, and several Washington postal officials visited the Essanay plant recently to study the method of making moving pictures, in order to perfect the national government's photographic system. The Washington officials plan to take moving pictures at the Chicago postoffice, showing the process which a letter goes through from the time it is dropped in the box until it is delivered. The pictures will be displayed at the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

A cablegram from Paris gives the information that a Belgian officer tells of seeing a moving picture camera man kneeling on the battlefield, calmly turning the handle of the machine while shells and bullets were flying all around. He was in full view of the German army, the members of which evidently had selected him for a target. Amid the rain of death he completed his film uninjured.

Binder Gives Details

Explains at Length Some of the Plans of the National Board of Censorship—Will Go After Ohio Law.

In a letter complimenting the Moving Picture World for its co-operation in the nation-wide campaign now being prosecuted against all forms of official and legalized censorship of motion pictures, J. W. Binder, director of publicity and finance of the National Board of Censorship, takes occasion to give further details of the campaign, not touched upon in previous articles. He says:

Let me, on behalf of the National Board of Censorship, thank you for giving so liberally of your space in support of the nation-wide campaign against all forms of official or legalized censorship which the Board is undertaking from a principle enunciated more than a year ago, when the Board placed itself on record as opposed to legalized consorship.

The story in your current issue, while it covers the general idea, leaves some of the details obscure. I am sure you will allow me to trespass further upon your space to set this out.

Briefly, the objects sought to be accomplished by the extension of the Board's activities are a wider and more efficient social service working through local unsalaried committees in fifty centres of population. These committees are to be selected from the same classes of organizations and societies as compose the parent body and are to be appointed by the executives of the different cities in which they will work. They are supplied with the weekly bulletin issued by the Board, and when they find pictures advertised for exhibition not listed on the same as having been passed by the Board, they investigate and report to the New York headquarters, and through the local authorities secure such action on each picture as the case seems to warrant.

In addition to this, the Board has adopted a new seal of approval. A campaign of advertising and publicity will be begun to teach the public at large what is represented by this seal; who compose the Board; how it works; what are its standards of criticism; and any other matters of interest so that when a theater-goer in Bangor, Maine, or Los Angeles, California, sees the Board's seal on a motion picture, he knows at once that the picture is a clean, high-grade production, which has had to stand the test of the Board's standards, intelligently and honestly applied. The seal bearing the signature of the Chairman of the Board, its unauthorized use becomes a forgery, and the public is this further protected.

In the campaign against legal or official censorship the mightiest power in the world will be invoked public opinion. To create this, the 23,000 newspapers in the United States will be used as well as the magazines and the trade press. In this work, the membership of the local committees will be a power, both in preparing articles showing the fallacies of official censorship, and its un-American principle, but in having the same published in their respective communities.

Of course, to do all this, and at the same time to carry on the work of censorship of pictures—an ever-going task will require money. On the principle that everyone in the motion picture industry, as well as those interested in social service, is vitally interested in the campaign, contributions have been solicited from every one touching these factors. From the response so far had, it is evident that the Board will be as heartily and liberally supported in this as it has always been in its previous work.

Doings at Los Angeles

THE Oz film factory has started a wild animal farm, Woozy, the studio cat, having presented the players with a bunch of playsome kittens. Jane Urban, late of the Orpheum time, is the latest addition to the stock company, and is playing Nephthys in "The Last Egyptian," which is now under production. The property man had to build tall palm trees for the India desert backgrounds.

Miss Jane Bernoudy, who is with the Universal players, and who has been seen both in the old country and at home in her clever roping exhibitions, has just returned from a successful trip to Pendleton, Ore., where she won the World's championship as woman roper and fancy rider. She won the same prize last year at the annual roundup.

A letter dated October 7 says: "Just a little news for you. I was married to Olga Prinzlau Clark last night in Los Angeles, who is scenario editor for the Exhibitors' Films Company, at the old Majestic studio. She has written 51 stories and sold 48." The writer was genial Hal Clements, known around here as one of the best directors in the business. He states further: "I am arranging at present to make a big educational picture out of civilization. Something new and different." Clements is on his honeymoon. He has been directing lately for the United States, and prior to that for three years was with Kalem.

California is the fourth state in line of registration of motor vehicles, and many western owners are moving picture people. Business Manager Fred Kely, of the Lasky forces, has joined with a roadster. This company has a regular stable of cars, and many of the players also own machines. They are using 136 people in "The Rose of the Rancho" at the Lasky ranch and the people are transported daily by an army of machines. A chef is employed to feed the actors at noon, and some big scenes are being made.

Marshal Neilan is building a big fence in front of his studio stage, and intends making a beautiful garden in the front, instead of the barren yard. He is putting on a comedy picture with some new stunts in it.

Frank M. Wiltermood, scenario editor for Balboa, who put up for the writers a novel method where rejection is necessary, has done something for the good of the business. When one sends him a story, if sent back, it brings with a comprehensive criticism, comparison to released subjects similar, and an envelope of hints, information, and a few ideas on technique.

Reginald Barker, directing "The Italian," has departed with his company for San Francisco to get some scenes for that picture. Clara Williams and other New York players accompanied him.

Myrtle Gonzalez, leading woman of Western Vitagraph, was seen this week in the role of an artist's model. The artist, desperate and tired of life, destroys his sculptured figures, but hesitates at "Inspiration," a beautiful woman portrayed by Miss Gonzalez, and as he gazes into the face, with his mallet poised in the air ready to break the figure, it gradually changes into real life, the girl steps out and takes him back to the days of old when he was the greatest artist in Paris. The girl then fades back into the inanimate statue and the artist's whole life is changed. He turns and becomes a success again. Margaret Gibson is his sweetheart in the film, and her part is a good one. A real artist was engaged to make the statue, and Miss Gonzalez was the model. Some good photography adds to the effect of this picture, which was written by Mary H. O'Connor.

"California Convention"

Third Annual Convention of the League in San Francisco Is Well Attended—Will Have a State Organizer.

THE third annual convention of California State Branch No. 12 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, originally scheduled to meet at Sacramento, was held at San Francisco October 6, 7, 8 and 9. Among the important measures acted upon at the convention were the propositions of placing a State organizer in the field to solicit membership, the publication of a bulletin for the benefit of country members, the admission of exchange and supply men to associate membership, and the securing, if possible, of the selection of San Francisco as the meeting place for the National organization in 1915.

Tuesday, October 6.

The gathering was called to order at 2 o'clock p. m. by President Charles Goddard, of Sacramento. Mayor Rolph was ably represented by his secretary, Edward Rainey. Mr. Rainey spoke of the very cordial relations that existed between the exhibitors and the city authorities and took occasion to thank theater owners for the splendid part they had taken in the rebulding of the city and for the valuable assistance that has been rendered from time to time in carrying out improvement projects. President Charles Goddard thanked the San Francisco local League for its hospitality. The business session commenced by the naming of the following committees: Auditing—A. M. Bowles, W. Krahn and H. C. Schmidt; credentials—L. Marks, William Englehart and C. E. Hart; resolutions—J. G. Piratsky, C. C. Kauffman and W. S. Smith.

President Goddard then delivered his annual address. Among other things he said:

It is only a short time ago when the exhibitor was pressed on the one side by the film exchange and on the other by adverse comment and legislation. The former told the exhibitor what his program must be, and he was not given any choice of selection. If the program tendered to him by his exchange did not suit him, well, that was too bad, but he could not get any other. And on the other hand, well-meaning people, and some of them speaking to their followers from different pulpits, believed motion picture houses to be a place of amusement that should be suppressed, and whenever any allusion to the motion picture business appeared in the daily papers it was always in an uncomplimentary way or else as a joke. City and State governments believed that the motion picture business should be regulated like the liquor business and the dope business, and all kinds of ordinances and acts were introduced against our business interest and intended to limit our sphere of usefulness, if not to put us out of business altogether. These were the things which caused the formation of this League, and what good work has been accomplished by us in the short period of our official life you must all concede when you look back at the hardships of the past and the troubles and annoyances which you have had to face. We are by no means out of the woods, we still have a great many obstacles confronting us, and must have the united strength of our profession to place the motion picture exhibiting industry in the place where it belongs, and to keep it there. It is to be regretted that quite a number of exhibitors of this State have as yet not joined our ranks, and I recommend that a committee on organization be formed at this convention whose duty it shall be to organize this State in a thorough manner and until all outsiders are in the protective fold of this League.

This is an age of consolidation, and even in our field of activity it is becoming apparent. Quite a few individual exhibitors of a few years ago have consolidated their investments and created the large motion picture theater, theaters that represent investments close on to a million dollars each, and, while these palaces have done a great deal toward the uplifting of our profession, still we must not forget the small motion picture house on the outskirts of large cities, in the suburbs, or in the country towns, and I desire to direct the attention of this convention toward measures which will tend to protect them and give their owners an opportunity to earn their livelihood. After all, however, it is competition which stimulates trade, and the small man is needed just as much as the big one, because were it not for the former it would be but a question of time when a great monopoly would control strings of theaters, and the quality and service would suffer. During my administration I have found, among other things, that the purchasing of lithographs is a very heavy burden upon the small exhibitor, and, inasmuch as these lithographs are intended to and do advertise, not the exhibitor, but the product of the manufacturer and the property of the exchange, it seems to me that these lithographs should be furnished by the manufacturer or the exchange, as the case may be, free of charge to the exhibitor, and I suggest that this convention take some steps leading in this direction.

I desire to call the attention of this convention to the fact that the Legislature of this State will meet at the commencement of the coming year, and as the feeling of prejudice against our craft does still survive in some quarters, I believe it to be prudent that this League keep a watchful eye on matters which may be brought before this Legislature, and which may have a bearing upon the motion picture exhibiting business, and I recommend that a committee be created and entrusted with these powers and duties.

The next convention of our National League may be held in the City of San Francisco. Of course, this has not yet been definitely decided upon, but we have grounds of hope. It would be a great opportunity for us to show our Eastern brothers what California can do, and there is no doubt that this meeting would prove a great help, not only to our State League, but to our locals as well. The housing and entertainment of such a convention, and it will be a large one, is a great task and it will require a great deal of labor and tact in order that we may discharge our duties as hosts with credit I do not consider that this would be a San Francisco affair. The whole of California would be interested in this meeting, and I, therefore, recommend that a general committee be appointed to handle the coming convention of our National League, if it will meet in this city or elsewhere in California, and that this committee have power to appoint as sub-committees such members of our State League as they may deem necessary.

The financial problem is just as important in the conduct of the business of this League as it is in your individual businesses. No business and no organization can be kept alive unless sufficient money is on hand for that purpose and enough is coming in from time to time to cover its needs.

I regret to state that a great many of our members have not met their obligations to this League in the same prompt manner in which they meet their private and other business obligations. We have done a great deal of good in the past and a great deal more remains yet to be done, and remember that in union there is strength, and that which one or two others cannot accomplish, may be done by united efforts. I call to your attention that even at this very moment our National government is endeavoring to impose on the motion picture theater this so-called war tax varying from $40 a year upward, and the officers of this League have taken upon themselves to send on numberless wires to their Senators in Washington, and to ask them to give their aid in defeating this measure.

And so it is in other matters. Things will come up continuously which require action, and unless you all stick together and enable this League to live, it is a question of time when your failure will be deeply regretted by you all. Our income now would be sufficient to pay our current expenses if all dues were promptly paid, but unfortunately this is not the case. A great many are in arrears and a great many more exhibitors have not joined hands with us. Gentlemen, your dues must be paid punctually and you should provide sufficient income to a little more than defray our running expenses, because something unforeseen, where money may be required, may come up at any unexpected moment.

Scene at California Convention Banquet.

Secretary W. A. Cory reported on the action that had been taken on the war tax proposition and read copies of telegrams that had been sent to the National League, members of the State League and to Washington. The answers to some of these were also read.

H. L. Beach, of Berkeley, president of the Oakland Local, spoke at length on the need of a bulletin to keep both city and country exhibitors in touch with the work that was being accomplished. W. B. Martin, of Modesto, followed. A committee was appointed to investigate the proposition and to report on Thursday morning—H. L. Beach of Berkeley; W. B. Martin, of Modesto, and J. Ray Williams, of Sacramento.

W. A. Cory discussed organization work and moved that a committee be appointed to report on plans for increasing the membership and that another be named to devise ways and means to finance the organization. Leo Kauffman, of San Francisco; H. C. Schmidt, of Palo Alto, and L. E. Lund, of San Diego, were named as a committee on organization, and M. E. Cory, of San Francisco; W. H. Hilts, of San Diego, and L. H. Marks, of Sacramento, as a finance committee.

Secretary Cory then read communications from exhibitors asking that matters pertaining to express charges be taken up at the meeting and proposed a committee of five country exhibitors be appointed to take up questions of particular interest to out-of-town members. The idea was approved and a committee composed of W. H. Rapp, Watsonville, chairman; A. M. Bowles, Livermore; Nick Turner, Chico; O. J. L. Byers, Angels Camp, and S. J. Greenwood, Tulare, was named by the Chair. The personnel of this committee was changed later, owing to the fact that several could not serve, and O. J. L. Byers was made chairman, with C. W. Douglas, of Merced, and H. D. Hubbard, of Calistoga, as members of the committee.

A communication from the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association urging the passage of resolutions against the adoption of the universal eight-hour law was read and ordered placed on file.

The resignation of Charles Rothchild as National vice-president from California was presented and accepted, he no longer being an exhibitor. He was made an honorary member of the League by acclamation.

G. B. Sargent, of the Lyric Theater, San Rafael, took up the condition of reels and stated that some exhibitors were suffering through the carelessness of others. He thought that some system of inspection of machines would be of value. This matter was discussed at length but no definite action was taken on it.

Wednesday, October 7.

M. L. Beach, chairman of the bulletin committee, reported that the proposition was one worthy of attention and recommended that it be published as soon as the finances of the organization would permit.

Judge A. P. Tugwell, of Los Angeles, expressed his happiness at the action of the Los Angeles exhibitors in again affiliating with the State League. He said there were now 10 moving picture houses in his city, with such frequent changes in ownership being made that even weekly visits to these amusement places failed to keep one in touch with these as fast as they occurred. The efforts that had been made by the Police Department in Los Angeles to secure the passage of an ordinance segregating the men from the women in moving picture houses had been successfully combatted by united action, and a proposition to unionize the operators had also been killed. He told of the work done at Sacramento in the last Legislature and how the Exhibitors' League had found in Governor Johnson a true friend.

Secretary W. A. Cory read his annual report. An early adjournment was made in order that all might prepare themselves for the steamer trip on the Bay in the afternoon.

Thursday, October 8.

M. R. Lund, of San Diego, gave an interesting talk on organization. This was followed by the report of the Committee on Organization, which was presented by Leo Kauffman. The report stated that in order to secure new memberships it would be necessary to send an organizer into the field to personally interview exhibitors and explain the advantages of belonging to the League. It recommended that the position of State Organizer be established at once, that sufficient money be raised to guarantee the expense of the organizer for one month, and that the initiation fee be reduced to $5, this amount to go to the organizer. It was also recommended that the organizer be guaranteed $6 a day for the first month.

Judge Tugwell heartily indorsed the idea. He promised to work hard in Los Angeles and stated that he believed that he could secure sixty members there. He declared that measures of utmost importance to the moving picture business would be introduced into the next legislature, several by members from Southern California. One of these is to be a state censorship board along the most drastic lines. It will provide that all exhibitors must secure a state license before they will be allowed to conduct a house, the board to have full power to act on the granting of these. He stated that another Sunday closing bill would be introduced, as well as one to prohibit the attendance of minors under sixteen years of age. To combat this adverse legislation the speaker pleaded for a strong organization.

The report was accepted, and within a few minutes a fund of almost $250 was raised.

The first order of business after noon was the election of officers. H. C. Schmidt, of Palo Alto, nominated H. L. Beach, of Berkeley, for State president, the nomination being seconded by M. E. Cory. The nominations were closed and Mr. Beach was unanimously elected State president. Judge Tugwell was unanimously chosen vice-president. The other officers are: W. H. Hilts, of San Diego, national vice-president; W. A. Cory, secretary; C. L. Mehrten, of Berkeley, treasurer, and H. C. Schmidt, of Palo Alto, sergeant-at-arms.

A number of exchange men were present, and President Goddard called upon several for short talks. J. C. Graham, of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, gave an instructive talk on organization. He declared that it was extremely vital that the men who handle the public be organized. Morris L. Markowitz, manager of the California Film Exchange, Inc.; Frank L. Hudson, manager of the Coast interests of the Eclectic Film Exchange, and J. W. Allen, district manager for Warner's Features, also made short addresses.

The chair was then turned over to the newly elected president, and the report of the country committee was rendered by O. J. L. Byers. The proposition of issuing a bulletin was heartily indorsed in the report.

Friday, October 9.

The first topic under discussion was that of inviting the National League to meet in San Francisco in 1915. M. E. Cory spoke on the possibilities of securing the convention and a general discussion then took place. Members of the State organization told of the desires of many of the leading exhibitors and manufacturers in the country to meet here next year. In connection with the Exposition there will be one of the greatest displays of moving picture supplies ever made and manufacturers will not be willing to duplicate the display in some other city. The leading men in the industry plan to come to San Francisco, convention or no convention, and will be glad to have the two events combined. It is believed that by holding the convention on the Coast exhibitors in the entire West can be organized and that the National League will be greatly strengthened. Every reference to holding the gathering here in 1915 aroused tumultuous applause and it was unanimously resolved that every effort be made toward this end. A committee of three, consisting of Charles Rothchild, I. Oppenheimer and M. E. Cory was appointed to secure definite data in regard to hotel rates, convention halls and every detail of value to intending visitors. The Mayor of the city sent word that the magnificent new auditorium on the Civic Center site, with a seating capacity of more than 12,000 in the main hall, and with several smaller halls, would be turned over to the National League if it would come here during the Exposition year. A hotel association has been formed, comprising nine-tenths of the hotels of the city, and a set schedule of rates has been decided upon that compares favorably with those now in force.

The matter of selecting a meeting place for the State League in 1915 was then discussed and Judge Tugwell proposed that it be held in San Francisco. He said: "My constituents at home instructed me to work for the selection of San Francisco. They all want to come here in 1915, the whole of Southern California, studio men, actors, actresses, directors, exhibitors, exchange men and all. They expect this trip to be the event of their lives and they all believe that it is as good as settled that the National League will also meet here next year. There is just one logical place in the whole State for the California convention and that is San Francisco, and there is one logical place for the National meeting, and that is San Francisco, also."

San Francisco was unanimously selected as the place for the 1915 convention.

M. E. Cory then offered a resolution against State censorship and this was adopted. W. A. Cory moved that exchange and supply men be admitted to associate membership of the State League, an idea that met with several favorable responses, and was adopted. Following a vote of thanks to Charles Goddard for his faithful services during the past year, the convention adjourned without a day.

On Friday evening a sumptuous banquet was given at the Hotel Sutter, this attracting an assemblage of 150, in spite of the fact that many country members had been compelled to leave for home. A moving picture machine was set up and pictures taken on the boat trip were shown, as well as views of the two previous meetings. Speech-making was also indulged in, the speakers being cleverly introduced by Toastmaster W. A. Cory.

Convention Leaders.

About 150 registered at convention hall, more than eighty of these being from out of town.

O. J. L. Byers, of Angels Camp, enjoys the distinction of being the only exhibitor in Calaveras County, and he conducts but one house. He did not miss a meeting during the convention.

J. G. Piratsky, of Watsonville, endeared himself to the convention delegates by sending a box of luscious apples from his own ranch.

The twenty-four sheet poster installed in the hall by the Box Office Attractions Company was generally admired, as were the illuminated lobby displays of the World Film Corporation.

Other exchanges having displays in the hall were the Universal, the Mutual, the Progressive, the Golden Gate, the Syndicate Film Corporation, and the Nat A. Magner Company. The Wisconsin Seating Company also had a display.

The following firms contributed financially to make the convention the success it was: Box Office Attractions, George Breck, California Film Exchange, Davis Brothers, Eclectic Film Co., General Film Co., Golden Gate Film Exchange, Independent Film Exchange, Kiewert Company, Nat Magner Company, George Metcalfe, National Screen Advertising Company, Pacific Gas and Electric Company, Pacific Mutual Film Corporation, Walter Preddy, Progressive Motion Picture Company, Syndicate Film Corporation, Union Film and Supply Company, Warner's Features, Al Williams and World Film Corporation.

The motion pictures taken during the convention were taken by the Sunset Motion Picture Co., M. E. Cory, manager.

Many of the country exhibitors attended the performances at the Tivoli Theater as guests of the Turner & Dahnken Circuit, and inspected that magnificent photoplay house.

British Notes.

THE London office of the "Flying A" company, under the direction of W. C. Scott, is engineering a praiseworthy scheme in connection with a Belgian historical film they have secured. The production, entitled "Thanksgiving Day in Belgian Waters," is illustrative of an ancient religious custom repeated annually in that country. The photography is the work of a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, H. M. Lomas, and by a special contract with him the American company is to devote all profits upon the sale of the film to the Belgian Relief Fund. Apart from this public-spirited action the film is intrinsically attractive and of historical value.

That the camera can depart from the truth in some of its records as well as can human beings is proverbial, but a story in this connection, really too good to miss, comes from a war correspondent at the time stationed in Antwerp. When the German army entered Brussels, he says, it was received by no means cordially. The nature of the welcome did not correspond with the warmth of the welcome, alleged in the commander's dispatch to Berlin, but apparently this could soon be rectified. Forthwith the resourceful commander ordered the Teutonic population of the city to station themselves in the windows of buildings fronting on the Place de la Palais and to cheer long and loud when the invaders again marched past. It seems to have all been very carefully rehearsed and the troops paraded around and around the square with the immaculate bearing born of the true actor. Across the road was a moving picture operator with a camera. Next day films of the "magnificent welcome to Brussels" of the Kaiser's troops were returned to Berlin and perhaps by this time are on the way to New York to aid in popularizing the German cause.

George Stevenson arrived here a few days ago to assume control of the publicity department of the Universal Company's London office, a position recently vacated by H. Z. Levine.

The most recent war specials of Pathe Freres are worthy of special notice and will command attention and patronage wherever exhibited. The destruction of Termonde, the disastrous effect of shell-fire at Malines, showing the ruined cathedral and the blown-up bridges over the River Scheldt, are depicted in a graphic manner. These are the most satisfactory war pictures that have yet been issued. Herbert Pauline, of Antarctic fame, has also been engaged securing moving pictures of the German advance into Belgium, and some of his efforts have yielded very fine results.

The effect of the stopping of chemical imports into this country from Germany is already being felt, but more severely in the photographic than in the motographic profession. Sodium hyposulphite before the war was 4 cents a pound. Now some dealers are asking half a dollar for this quantity. Bromide, amidol, hydrochinone, metol and pyrogallic acid are the chief developing agents for which we have been dependent upon Germany for the bulk of our supply. But this order is promised an early change, for with commendable hustling Messrs. Johnson & Sons, of Finsbury, have opened a special factory and plant for the manufacture of amidol, and all in less than six weeks. Amidol used for films gives a slightly blue image and is admirable for films that need subsequent coloring. The British-made product retails here at a fraction under half a dollar an ounce. Metol and hydrochinone are being manufactured in England under the direction of T. Thorne Baker, and are retailed by the White Band Manufacturing Company, South Croydon.

A valiant attempt to obtain the licensing authorities' permission to open exhibitions on the Sabbath has been made throughout the country during the past fortnight by the different branches of the Kinematograph Exhibitors' Association. In every case the proceeds of such exhibitions were to be contributed to the National Relief Fund, and consequently the more businesslike authorities have taken advantage of the offer; but the majority firmly opposed the innovation. A most perplexing legal position is precipitated by these contrary rulings, one which sooner or later will be thrashed out in Parliament. Evidently there is no prescribed judicial verdict one way or another, for while exhibitors have often been convicted for Sunday opening a charge preferred at Croyden last week against an exhibitor for opening his doors on the Sabbath failed significantly.

Maxim Gorky, poet and patriot of Russia, has joined the ranks of the Czar's army. A few days before the outbreak of the war a representative of a leading American manufacturing company approached the author and offered him a most liberal fee to write a few scenarios. Although Gorky is open in his admiration of the utility and value of moving pictures, the enterprising producer was not successful in his endeavors.

OZ OPENS NEW YORK OFFICE.

The Oz Film Manufacturing Company has just opened a New York office at 220 West Forty-second street, in charge of Frank J. Baum, as special representative.

This places the company in the centre of the film releasing business in this country.

COLOSSUS FILM CO. HANDLES SAWYER PRODUCT.

Sawyer, Inc., have turned over their New York Zone Exchange to the Colossus Film Co., of 110 West 40th Street. This move was decided upon to relieve the congestion of business at their main office, where the affairs of the local exchange took up time that should be given by the executive staff to affairs of far greater importance. All Sawyer features may now be booked through them for greater New York and the suburbs.

"IRELAND A NATION" GOING STRONG.

Walter Macnamara, producer of the five-part Irish historical drama "Ireland a Nation," reports that this week eight shows are doing a good business. The Forty-fourth Street theater in New York is filled at all performances. Wednesday evening there were present Macnamaras from all over the State of New York—some one said it seemed as if all of them must have been on hand. Friday night the entire orchestra was taken by the Gaelic societies of Manhattan. Other cities in which "Ireland a Nation" is this week being shown are Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, and New Rochelle. It is expected next week five more shows will be put out.

Pearce Urges Amalgamation

Attends Installation of New York Association Officers and Emphasises the Dayton Resolution.

A MEETING of the Executive Committee of the I. M. P. A. of New York was held last Friday, October 16th, at the headquarters of the organization, on the second floor of the Hotel Marlborough at Broadway and Thirty-sixth street. There was a full attendance of the committee and the rooms were crowded to capacity by friends of the new officers who were to be installed. The installation was taken charge of by James Denton, of New Jersey, who performed his task with satisfaction to everybody. Each one of the new officers made a few remarks on assuming office, all of which were well received.

After the routine of the meeting had been disposed of Samuel Trigger, the former president, called upon Marion S. Pearce, the national president of the Exhibitors' League of America, for an address. Mr. Pearce had come up from Baltimore, despite pressing personal business, to be present at the installation of officers and to urge upon all New York exhibitors the necessity of getting together under the language of the Dayton resolutions.

"The whole country," said Mr. Pearce, who was listened to with the closest attention, "seems to be waiting for action in New York. I travel about the country a great deal in League matters, and it seems as if the attention of League members was focussed upon New York. When these conciliatory resolutions were adopted at Dayton I thought that everything would be clear sailing. I did not concern myself much about conditions and hoped that everything would develop in natural order. There are times when it seems best to let things go their course, and when interference would not improve matters. The case of New York seems to require different treatment. Patience is about exhausted. I am not finding fault with anybody; you did not want to break down the doors, you wanted them opened. Well, I want to urge harmony upon all of you. Proceed in the way the Dayton resolutions point out and as far as lies in my power I will aid you in every effort toward achieving harmony. I stand ready to present your applications to the league officials in this state."

A burst of applause followed these remarks of President Pearce. Ex-President Trigger thanked Mr. Pearce for his address and said harmony was in the air. He predicted the speedy success of the movement for amalgamation. Upon motion the whole question of amalgamation was laid over until early next month, the exact time for the meeting to be announced later.

PEARCE TALKS TO JERSEY EXHIBITORS.

On Thursday morning, October 15, a meeting of the Bergen County (N. J.) exhibitors was held at the Susquehanna Hotel, Hackensack, N. J. There was a good attendance when the meeting was called to order at 10.30 o'clock and those present were agreeably surprised and pleased to receive a visit from President Pearce of the National Exhibitors' League. Great interest was shown in the efforts that had been made by President Pearce in securing a reduction of the proposed war tax on picture houses and the opinion was freely expressed that even greater concessions might have been secured had the exhibitors been properly organized.

Consquently President Pearce found the Bergen County exhibitors keen for a thorough organization of the trade in New Jersey as a matter of protection as well as for the advancement of the business generally. It is quite likely that steps will be taken to get the State in line.

"The Fiends of Hell"

Apex Four-Reel Detective Story—English Sleuth with Occult Powers Is Pitted Against Chinese Craft.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE English detective, Rex Omar, has such wonderful occult powers that he would be absolutely irresistible against any ordinary opponents; but in this case he is pitted against a secret society of Chinese adventurers. The object of these Orientals is to get control, by any means whatever, of all new inventions—their ultimate object is to control the world.

As the story opens, these Chinamen have learned of two new discoveries by Englishmen. The most important of these is a new metal, stronger than steel and so light that an airship made of it will float. The other is a new kind of electric current. The two most astute members of the club are sent to England to get control of these. We see them arrive at the hotel. They are richly dressed in the habiliments of the higher class in China. We may say at this point that there is apparently nothing cheap in the staging of this picture from first to last. It is full of astonishing and unexpected twists and makes ample use of such things as hypnotic telepathy, drugged newspapers and the like. A clock with swords for hands is also found among the contrivances for creating thrills. The Chinamen, when they catch the detective, fasten him in it in such a way that he has to listen to it ticking the minutes off to his death as the hands creep around toward his throat. Moreover the tale starts with an excellent, dramatic situation. The story is not closely woven and the very fact that the detective has such tremendous powers makes it a bit one-sided. Yet it is so filled with marvels and thrills that it holds attention, excites a good measure of suspense and can safely be relied upon as an offering of entertainment. The acting is of good quality throughout.

There is much in stories of this kind that must slip by in any word description of them. But an account of the high parts can give a clear notion of the picture's quality by indicating its drift. When the two Chinamen arrive at their hotel, the detective notices them. When they are calling on the electrical inventor, he happens in and overhears them talking together alone. He gets the pass-word of their society and learns that they intend to kill the inventor who has refused to sell his discovery. He takes a Chinese disguise, and, after leaving his Hindoo assistant in a hypnotic trance before a mirror, enters the club rooms. He is discovered and the clock is brought out; his head is placed in it and the hands started on their trip around to his throat. He sends a message to the girl, which we see as a picture on the mirror, and she sends the police, who arrive in time. This would, of course, have broken up the gang in real life; but it still has power and the story continues.

One of the gang gets the combination of the safe of the inventor of the new metal and they steal his airship model, leaving a drugged newspaper. The inventor's valet gets this and lies a corpse on the floor. The inventor finds that his model is gone; but as the model is of no use without him the gang puts a second paper and he too is drugged and carried out. The detective, investigating, finds the paper and knows how to make an antidote that will counteract the drug's effects. These scenes give a chance to bring in pictures of work in scientific laboratories that almost always make good in pictures—a laboratory is a place of wonder to the average spectator. With the antidote, the detective revives all the victims. The Chinamen revive the inventor; but he plays a trick on them and they fear that he is not coming out of his stupor. They call a man whom they think a doctor—the detective in disguise. He tells them that they have to use a high-voltage electric current and gets them all to a lighting station. He manages to get his revolver out and nonchalantly holds them all calmly, killing one or two who try to get him, while he makes all the lights in the neighborhood flicker in Morse a call for help. The police look up with wonder to the blinking lamps above them till somebody sends in a phone message that help is wanted at the power station. This time all the fiends are arrested and the ending comes.

MESSRS. STINEMAN AND FARR INCORPORATE.

Stineman and Farr, of San Diego, Cal., who have for the past year made industrial and educational subjects and also done topical film work, have filed articles of incorporation of the Maya Film Company. The company takes over the motion picture business of the two men. The intention of the Maya company is to continue the same line of work and also to produce a line of fillers or split reels from Mexico. Also something spectacular for 1915.

The Art of Exhibition

Rothapfel on Motion Picture Music—Its Objects and Its Possibilities—"Playing the Pictures"—A Budget of Good Suggestions for the Small as Well as the Big Theater.

By W. Stephen Bush.

ONE great lesson is being brought home to me by my weekly talks with Rothapfel on the art of exhibition. Exhibiting motion pictures is essentially a new profession and no previous training in any other branch in the business of amusing and entertaining the public will count for very much in the make-up of the successful exhibitor. The man who will hereafter win fame and distinction through his ability to present motion pictures must be something of a musician, something of a specialist in projection, something of an expert in the selection of programs, something of a leader and pioneer, something of an appraiser in all matters of taste, and all these abilities must be fused and blended in just the right proportion.

I know, through the pleasure of personal acquaintanceship, that there are more such exhibitors today than ever before, and when I point to Rothapfel as the best type I surely do not mean to imply that there are no others. All this leads up, naturally, to the subject of this interview, to-wit: Music and the motion picture. The Strand music has become famous, and it is well therefore to listen to the man responsible for this music.

"A book might be written on this subject of unending interest," said Rothapfel as he sat in his office and after he had thoroughly secured himself against the possibility of interruption.

"Yes, music is just as important as the screen is. I pay more attention and give more time to music than to any other accessory in my whole entertainment. The atmosphere of a theater depends in no small measure upon the character of the music. I look to the music to create the feeling of enthusiasm and sympathy in my audience. Music disposes them to accept my performance in the proper spirit. The main object of music, however, is to interpret the story on the screen. Before going any further, let me say that only in certain cases, which I will explain later, do we indulge in what is known as 'playing the pictures.'

"'Playing the pictures' is still the bane of many otherwise intelligently conducted theaters. I have heard managers say time and again how proud they were of their music, that their leader knew how to 'play the pictures.' 'Playing the pictures, is a relic of the crudest stage in the development of motion picture exhibition. We all know what it means: Little 'hurries' for galloping horses, a little pathos for a touching scene, etc. At times I would observe flashes of real intelligence where the music would really begin to interpret the picture, but, as a rule, it was merely an accident and my hopes were disappointed by hearing the reversion to the regular style of 'playing the pictures.'

He Says He is No Musician.

"As I am not a musician and afraid of being misunderstood, I will just confine myself to saying that each big picture—the feature of the program, if you will—must be interpreted musically by a general theme which characterizes the nature of the film play. To select this theme it is, of course, necessary to study the entire picture. Let me give an example. In the play of 'Such a Little Queen,' in which Mary Pickford takes the leading part, a little waltz from 'Sari' appealed to me. It had a note of pathos alternating with brilliancy and I thought it typical of the character of the queen. If the selection of the theme is a happy one and the theme is capable of being counter-pointed to suit the varying emotions of the play, the effect upon the audience is undeniable. I had the original waltz played as the little queen was coming down the stairs, and it interpreted in a flash the characteristics of the leading character. I caught the atmosphere of the play and variations of the theme accompanied all the telling scenes greatly to the delight of the audience.

"I can give no hard and fast rules for the selection of such a theme. A little knowledge of musical repertoire is needed, of course, and one really cannot have too much of this. A musical memory, too, is very essential and in my case, at least, is a most useful substitute for profound technical knowledge. Now, after having chosen a general theme for my big feature, I feel at liberty to introduce incidental music which has no relation to the general theme. Such incidental music may be a march, a few bars of a popular or patriotic song, etc. This incidental music must fit episodes and situations that are not directly and intimately connected with the main character or the strict dramatic action of the photoplay.

Symphonies in Pictures.

"Some day I hope great symphonies will be illustrated with motion pictures and then we will have one of the phases of the true relation between the motion picture and music. When we hear music we see pictures. Why should we not be able to reverse this process? The theme must have a climax, that is to say, after accentuating and interpreting the play on the screen, the music must rise to a grand finale and bring out every note of pathos in the picture. This, of course, is very important. If the climax is either overdone or underdone, the effect of the theme is lost and the effort in vain. Rare judgment must be used and one's whole soul and thought must be at their best. So much for music with features.

"I think that the playing of an overture before any picture is shown on the screen is a proper way to begin the entertainment. The overture puts the audience in the proper mood. I know of no better preparation for the audience. The topical review we generally start with a march and carry it along until the first sub-title appears and then we make the music correspond to the picture.

"This, you will say, is 'playing the pictures.' Yes, quite so. But here, 'playing the pictures' is entirely proper and I know of no other way to illustrate a topical review to advantage. In showing a baseball scene, it is entirely proper to give some snappy, popular music and let the impact of ball and bat be plainly heard in the orchestra. If the thing is done properly it rings absolutely true and never fails to please the audience."

Picking Music for Dangerous and Doubtful Spots.

By this time it was clear to me that Mr. Rothapfel was analyzing the parts of his own program for the current week and I suggested that we go in the theater and sit down among the audience to listen and learn. I had not seen the show and I was very anxious to find out what music he had chosen for the pictures of the smoking ruins and the charred walls of the Belgian villages that had been struck by the furious God of War. Surely, it seems difficult to find music suitable to such pictures. Indeed, any music with such scenes, most at first thought seem altogether incongruous. The screen showed nothing but dull desolation, oppressive in its sameness. Imagine my surprise when I heard the orchestra playing a prelude by the Russian composer Rochmaninov, which, in an almost inspired manner, illustrated and interpreted in harmonized sound the horrors of war. It was terrible, pathetic, gripping. The music supplied what the picture failed to show: The terror-stricken men, the agonized women and children, the tramp of the pitiless conqueror. The effect of the music upon the audience was startling. As the last scene passed away, I heard a brief collective sigh go up and then a swift, short, strong burst of applause.

"Scenic pictures," continued Rothapfel, "offer fine opportunities and occasionally raise such a picture to the importance of the biggest item on the program. Much, for instance, can be made of a pastoral scene. It is delightful to hear the tinkling of a bell in the distance or the fall of water or the roaring of the surf, etc. Only good music will do here, nothing trashy. The music for such pictures should never be too loud. In showing Swiss, Neapolitan, Venetian scenes or landscapes of a similar character, an aria sung behind the scenes never fails to captivate the audience. For pictures showing animal life, pathos and humor should be the dominant notes, played daintily. For scientific pictures a faint monotone, something entirely neutral, is to be preferred and where the subject touches the purely scientific, perhaps an entire stop in the music might be recommended. Comedy should be played to action, a one-step or some light air, good comic opera and musical interpolations get many a laugh when put in a good place. Here the music, of course, can aim at nothing higher than accentuating the comedy situation."

Music for the Exhibitor with a Small Equipment.

"In our enthusiasm for your present musical achievements," said I, "let us not forget the exhibitor who lacks your splendid equipment."

"You forget," replied Rothapfel, with one of his characteristic smiles, "that no man ever started with a more limited equipment than your humble servant. My entire musical outfit consisted of a piano. Of course, I had no experience and no training, but my ideals were the same then and even in my humble and dingy surroundings I tried to make music the big feature of my program. I was so anxious about the music that I spent a good deal of time explaining things to my pianist and I was very much worried as to whether she would carry out my ideas. To make assurance doubly sure, I rigged up an electric switchboard with six colors which she always had in sight and which I operated from the booth where I turned the crank. Oh, yes; I was operating my own machine. We got along very well after awhile. In one sense the man who has no other music than a piano has a much easier time than the conductor of a big orchestra, for he has nothing but his instrument to control.

"Where the exhibitor is able to afford more than a piano, I think a violin might be added first and then an organ; a pipe organ, however small. With these three instruments it is possible to play almost anything. In the Hotel Astor these three instruments, night after night, render a program so varied and beautiful that you would never think that the musical outfit producing it consisted of but these three elements. I would not add anything more to these three instruments until I were able to have an orchestra of ten pieces, as follows: Piano, organ, first violin, second violin, viola, 'cello, bass, clarinet, flute, drum. If I were to enlarge this orchestra I would add two French horns, another trumpet, another clarinet and more strings to meet the added increase of tone.

The Study of Motion Picture Music Still in Its Infancy.

"The failure of exhibitors to make the most of the musical end of their program has resulted in the closing of many a house that might otherwise have proven a success. Even now our study of this subject is far from thorough and our knowledge far from complete. I only know that I personally have restored the success and popularity of many a motion picture theater, merely by specializing in motion picture music.

"The men who render music to embellish and strengthen the picture must not only be well-trained musicians, but they must have some special qualification. I prefer young men and women who can be more easily moulded and in whom the fire of enthusiasm burns most brightly. Every motion picture musician must have the knack of improvisation, the ability to instantly adapt himself to any class of music. Men or women who are mechanically perfect but otherwise ordinary will not make good material for a first-class motion picture orchestra. I look for a spark of originality in everyone of my musicians, and where I see a man or woman who does things just a little different I try to encourage them all I know how. I consider the character or rather the temperament of my musicians and find that men who have traits of good nature, who are loyal and in love with their work, are the most valuable. The kind of musicians I want to keep away from is the man who tries to subordinate the pictures to the music. After all, the pictures must always remain the groundwork of our entertainment, and it just jars me when I hear an orchestra hammer away all through a picture with but small regard for the action on the screen. When a musician begins to think that the people come mainly to hear the music and that the pictures are but an incident, he has outlived his usefulness with me.

"I repeat that managers cannot evade their responsibility for the share which music must play in every motion picture entertainment. They must control and inspire the leader. The manager should have some idea as to the qualifications of the musicians and realize that one good musician is worth more than five mediocre men. Every orchestra leader should have on his finger-tips the airs of all nations, the bugle calls of all countries and know plenty of good "hurries," mysterioso, etc. In selecting themes it is well to keep away from the hackneyed stuff which everybody uses. There is a perfect wealth of excerpts from operas and overtures that have never been used and will be found suitable for all kinds of occasions.

Music and the Daily Change Man.

"Of course, when a man changes every day he really cannot do the music full justice unless he has a wonderful organization. If he has the right training and a competent staff and if he will make it a point to have his pictures ready for rehearsal early in the morning he may surprise himself at what he can do. Practice of this sort is invaluable to an exhibitor. We have had emergency cases in the Strand where our whole musical program had to be changed on a few hours notice, but nothing is impossible if you have the energy and proper assistance."

Rothapfel Often Leads the Orchestra Himself.

Rothapfel himself takes up the little piece of wood called baton and takes the place of the leader. Watching him at such moments from the wings it is easy to get the right perspective of his passionate love and study of music. In his hands the baton indeed becomes a magic wand. His orchestra realizes the intimate touch between himself and them and this is a great advantage. It infuses into them a spirit of cooperation and responsibility.

Visitors to the Strand have often been struck by the quiet behavior of the musicians. One scarcely realizes that they are there. They come and disappear almost noiselessly. In many orchestras, even in big theaters, the musicians seem to be anxious to impress the public with the fact that they take none but the most perfunctory interest in their work, that they do not pretend to be artistes but merely mechanics whose chief interest centers in watching the movement of the clock. This feeling of contemptuous indifference toward their own art manifests itself in such men by loud talk, and by ill-repressed laughter suggestive of late hours in a barroom. Such an orchestra, whether at play or at rest, will never send any magnetic currents into the audience and will simply kill all atmosphere. In the management of Rothapfel's orchestra none of these evils appear and he takes care that the spell which music winds about the human heart is never broken at the Strand.

NEWS NOTES FROM ALL OVER.

The Board of Education of Louisville, Ky., has indorsed the plans of the Parent-Teachers' League, which is to provide motion picture entertainments for school children. The league will appoint a committee to select suitable subjects.

Grand Rapids, Mich., has declined to issue a license for a picture show on a block on which already there is a similar enterprise.

Jack London's "John Barleycorn," produced by Bosworth, is to be shown throughout Michigan in the campaign being made in that state by the prohibitionists.

The Pike's Peak Motion Picture Company is beginning operations in Colorado Springs. Otis B. Thayer, formerly with Selig, is general manager of the new concern. J. F. Underwood is office manager, and J. A. Jeancon is scenario editor. It is announced that the company will produce legitimate melodrama with a western atmosphere. "We have the best natural stage in the world for this purpose," said Mr. Thayer recently. "The amount of sunshine in the Pike's Peak region gives us an advantage. I think the day of the crude western play, made up principally of cowboys, horses and guns is waning, and we want a higher class drama with a western setting such as this region can furnish. We expect to work right through the winter."

The Grand Avenue Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, Mo., will be converted into a picture theater, according to the terms of a five-year lease just executed. The structure, with its 144-foot lot, has been purchased by Louis Cella for $144,000, who has leased it to a group of men who are preparing to form a corporation to operate it as a theater. In place of the pews 800 opera chairs will be installed. A new entrance will be made and exits added.

The recent decision of Mayor John A. Denison of Springfield, Mass., to open the picture theaters on Sundays has been approved by the citizens of the city in the most hearty fashion. It is believed the attendance at the houses on the first Sunday of October will settle the question beyond doubt. It was a warm night, but the theaters were crowded.

The annual report of the commissioners of state police of Connecticut sets forth the improved conditions among the picture theaters of the state. During the year there have been 490 inspections made of plans, buildings, premises and booths. There have been 250 buildings and booths approved for motion picture exhibitions. There have been 177 operators examined and 152 licenses granted. Also 356 operators' licenses have been renewed for 1914-15. The fees for the new licenses granted have amounted to $456, and those for renewals have amounted to $366.50. Fees for inspections of plans and buildings have amounted to $2,041.70. In all, this branch of the service has put $2,864.20 in the state treasury.

"HUB" TAYLOR BUYS THEATER.

Herbert L. (Hub) Taylor, who, in his seven years' experience in the motion picture business was connected respectively with Miles Bros., Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, Film Supply Company of America and the Exclusive Supply Corporation, has purchased, with a partner, the Savoy Theater in Mt. Vernon, N. Y.

This is a 1,500-seat theater and formerly housed the Proctor amusement enterprises. Mr. Taylor has installed the Paramount program, filling in with selections from the Universal program.

Among the Picture Theaters

GRAND THEATER, DULUTH, MINN.

Big Crowds Continually Poured Into New Moving Picture and Vaudeville House on Opening Day.

DULUTH, MINN., has another beautiful moving picture and vaudeville house added to its category of excellent theaters. The appellation of the new structure is the Grand, and it was built by the New Grand Theater Company, Inc., Grand Theater building, Duluth, Minn. The company is composed of M. S. Cook, president; Julius Cook, vice-president, and B. J. Cook, secretary and treasurer. The house is under the management of Frank Phelps, who has been in the show business for the past nineteen years. He comes to the Grand theater from the Shuberts' employ. Mr. Phelps has managed a number of leading theaters and attractions all over the country and was only recently manager of the Princess theater in Chicago. He also held the position of general traveling representative for the Shuberts when it was Mr. Phelps' duty to travel from one theater to another and adjust the managements. The experience gained by Mr. Phelps' long connection with the theatrical business undoubtedly fits him for the position of manager of the Grand Theater. This beautiful edifice was opened in the latter part of August, and housed 7,200 persons on the opening day.

Frank Phelps.

Grand Theater, Duluth, Minn.

Everyone left their seats after seeing the show perfectly satisfied that if the entertainment given at the Grand is to be kept up to its opening day standard that the money invested in the structure will be quickly earned.

The big electric sign and bright lights in front of the entrance serves as an excellent reminder to the public that the new house was now "light." The theater front is an attraction in itself. It is constructed of tapestry brick in Flemish bond, trimmed in semi-glazed terra cotta.

Other attractive features of the entrance are the arched mahogany doorways, art glass windows and a big canopy of steel and glass.

The average "first nighter" who was jostled around for a while in the crowd waiting to get inside on the opening day on gaining admission to the theater was probably first attracted by its excellent ventilation and its comfortable seats. The interior of the theater is beautiful and at the same time conforms with the latest ideas of fireproof construction.

PALACE THEATER, MUSCATINE, IA.

THE Palace Theater, Muscatine, Ia., was opened February 4. The building and appointments cost $35,000, and the ground $10,000. It is built on a site 50 by 100 feet, the design of the structure being made by Edward M. Henle, the owner, only the blueprints being furnished by an architect. Mr. Henle superintended the construction himself, and acted as chief contractor throughout its erection. Everything used in the construction was ordered and purchased by Mr. Henle.

The theater has an alley on both sides and at the back, and is located on a main street, which gives it access all around for exits in case of fire or panic. There are seven ground exits, which lessen the probability for accidents to occur from fire or otherwise. The Palace was pronounced by the state building department and the city fire warden as one of the safest theaters in Iowa in case of fire. The house has a seating capacity of 800, the ground floor seating 660 persons and 140 in the gallery and loges.

The front is built of pressed brick and stucco, and is quite attractive, as the accompanying illustration will show. The lobby and interior decorations, which are thoroughly modern, are the work of the Decorators Supply Co., of Chicago. Traveling men who frequent the Palace bear witness that the pictures shown there are among the best projected. Three or four reels of pictures are shown at five and ten cents, the latter price being charged for feature progams.

PALACE THEATER, AMITY, ORE.

THE accompanying illustration shows the Palace Theater, Amity, Ore., decorated in celebration of the Fourth of July. H. Schaeffer, the owner and manager, says that when his town, which has a population of 500—mind you, 500, and a picture theater thriving in it—does not celebrate on the Day of Independence, the inhabitants usually go to some neighboring town or city which does expend a few dollars on pyrotechnical displays. In order to obviate such an occurrence, as it would be detrimental to his business, Mr. Schaeffer "got busy," in the vernacular of the pavement, and decorated his house to meet the occasion and put on a splendid show consisting of pictures suitable for such a glorious day. The resultant effect was that the Palace Theater did an extraordinary amount of business. We have published many times before in this paper accounts of picture theaters making a profitable income in small towns, if properly managed, but to have a moving picture theater which can accommodate a little over 150 persons doing a good business for six nights in every week in a town with ouly 500 population is not only highly commendable, but it would seem to eclipse all other accounts of picture theaters existing in small towns. Mr. Schaeffer has been in the picture business for only two years, and all of his investments have been profitable. Judging from the photograph that we have received of Mr. Schaeffer, which lack of space does not permit us to use, he is a comparatively young man, and undoubtedly still in his twenties. Music is furnished by a player-piano, and the pictures are projected by an Edison machine. A Fort Wayne Compensarc is a part of the splendid equipment in the operating room. Mr. Schaeffer gives two shows each night. Each show consists of four reels, and the entertainment is changed three times a week. Mr. Schaeffer says that he finds much valuable information in the Moving Picture World and eagerly awaits each issue.

CLEVELAND STANDARD BEAUTIFUL.

Attesting the beauty of Cleveland's new playhouse, the Standard, Prospect avenue and East Eighth street, the accompanying photograph presents a distinct view of the interior. The seating capacity and arrangement of the Standard are the source of complimentary remarks. It is the largest exclusive motion picture theater in the downtown district. Joseph Grossman is manager of the house.

LITTLE ROCK'S NEW $100,000 THEATER.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., can now boast of a first-class moving picture theater. This new house is the Palace Theater, under the management of S. A. Arnold. It was opened on the first of June, and the daily receipts are balancing by great amounts the large expenditure involved in the erection of this beautiful picture place—for, indeed, it may be placed in that category, judging from the accompanying illustration of the interior. In the words of Mr. Arnold, "It is the finest picture theater in the United States, outside of the Strand in New York City." The Palace has a seating capacity of 1,200, and is furnished with all modern conveniences. The dimensions of the structure are 50 by 150 feet, and it was built at a cost of $100,000. There is a spacious and neatly furnished resting room for women, and a comfortable smoking room for men. There are sanitary drinking fountains in convenient places throughout the auditorium, and the indirect lighting system is used. Thirty-two large exits have been provided for.

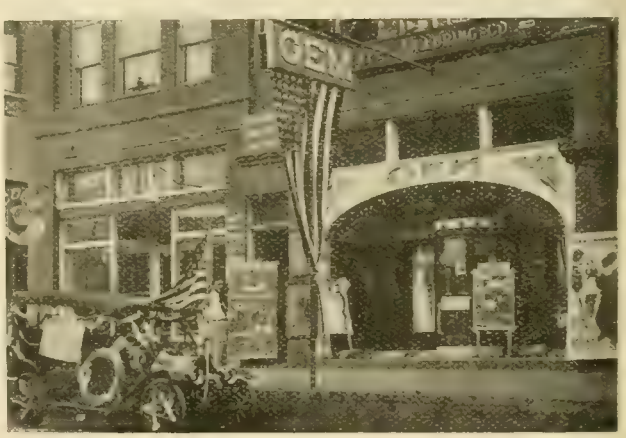
As can be seen from the accompanying illustration, the large pipe organ is in two sections, one section on each side of the stage. Each section is then divided into three parts with the pipes of that part of the organ placed in beautiful arches, giving a most imposing effect. The exterior of the house is just as beautiful as the interior.

NEW THEATER INCORPORATION.

The Empire Amusement Company has been incorporated under the laws of the state of Kentucky to build and operate picture houses and to buy and rent state right pictures. The Empire Company is a five-thousand-dollar concern, and is now operating the Empire Theater at Hazard, Ky. The other picture house which the company is building is at Whitesburg and will be opened in a few weeks. The incorporators are: T. L. Johnson, J. G. Kinner and Robert Cooksey. Vaudeville forms part of the entertainment at the Hazard Theater and probably will be used in the house at Whitesburg.



Gem Theater, Palestine, Tex.

NEW MISSION THEATER, SEATTLE, WASH.

THE accompanying pictures herewith show the Mission Theater, of Seattle, Wash., one of the prettiest theaters on the Pacific Coast. The Mission Theater represents an investment of over $80,000 on the part of local business men, which shows the faith of these men in the continued growth of Seattle, and the motion picture business. While this theater is not the largest, it is one of the most completely equipped and one of the most attractively furnished photoplay house of its kind. The interior and the exterior of the theater are both carried out along the lines of the old California Missions, there being a stucco front and a red-tiled roof. The lobby and the front of the stage are decorated with southern California scenes. Above the panels on the side-walls ivy-leaves are worked out in stencil. The building is absolutely fireproof, the only wood being used is the beaming, and the paneling of the interior finish.

The seating capacity is 900, and includes seven large loges in front of the balcony. The loges are fitted with upholstered and armed wicker chairs. The orchestra and the balcony chairs are of the Marlborough style with deep barrel backs, same being furnished by the Andrews Co. Everything about the theater is in Mission style, inside and out. There are 5,000 electric lights in the dome over the front, and around the edges of the markee. Inside there is a subdued effect from lights showing through grill work, on the boxes along the side walls, and through the beautiful decorated leaded glass in the ceiling. The lighting is the most unique yet attempted in Seattle.

The main foyer, aisles, loges, and balcony foyer are covered with mission brown carpets and draperies. The proscenium arch is hung with a brown velour curtain in mission design with a center medallion of the theater's crest. The heating is electric with cold air drawn in through the dome over electric coils and out through the stage. For ventilation the fresh air is drawn in through one of the domes and forced down into the theater by fans; then drawn out under the stage.

On the second floor is the women's rest room and it is neatly furnished with white enamel furniture, brown carpets and draperies to match the interior of the theater. Needless to say the men's smoking room is just as handsome. F. J. McCurdy, who is manager of the Mission, is known throughout the Northwest, and has expressed himself as being more than satisfied with results since the opening. The operating room (which is considered the best in Seattle) was designed by Jay Harrington, an operator of long experience. The equipment consists of two motor-driven Simplex machines, stereopticon and spot-light. It also has hot and cold water, house and city 'phone, and plenty of ventilation.

GLADWIN PARK THEATER, DETROIT, MICH.

WHEN the promoters of the Gladwin Park Theater, situated at Jefferson avenue and Gladwin avenue, adjoining the Water Works Park, Detroit, announced their intention to build a theater that would seat 900 persons they were actually "laughed at" by many of their friends, who were "positive" that the house would never be a paying proposition in that section of the city and further contending that "there were too many picture houses in Detroit anyway." Nevertheless, the promoters decided to proceed with the plans and if necessary to take all of the stock themselves. The company was incorporated for approximately $50,000 and practically none of the stock was offered for sale to outside parties. Those who did buy were people who lived in the immediate vicinity of the theater. Fortunately, one of the men behind the project was an architect, and several others engineers and contractors, so that they knew exactly the kind of a theater that should be built, and contracts were let accordingly. There wasn't a day during the construction of the house that these men did not look over the work and personally see that everything was being done exactly as planned. The building was completed in record time and was opened the past summer.

The frontage of the Gladwin Park Theater is 91 feet on

Gladwin Park Theater, Detroit, Mich.

Jefferson avenue, running back 136 feet. It is of brick and cement construction. The front is unusually well lighted, there being a total of 332 electric lights used in the sign and general decoration. The house seats 900. There are 16 boxes on the sides which have a total seating capacity of 122. There is a small store on each side of the theater entrance and also four offices above the box office, facing the front which are rented out. The prices of admission are 10 and 15 cents. Performances are given three times daily, one matinee and two at night. A special matinee for children is given each Saturday and the price reduced to five cents. The program is changed every day. In addition to the motion pictures there is a soloist who renders several selections at the commencement of each show.

The house is attractively decorated, there being 19 large panel paintings of foreign scenes. It has the washed air system for cooling and ventilating. The patrons go in the front way, but never come out that way; instead they make their exit through the sides, there being three exits on each side. By this arrangement, those who are waiting for the second show are not jostled by patrons leaving the theater after the first show; in fact, they do not even see one another. The result is that the house is emptied and filled very quickly.

The throw from the operator's booth to the picture screen is 106 feet, being one of the longest in the city. The house itself is peculiar in shape, being that of a megaphone—wide at the rear and narrow at the front. From every seat in the house there is an excellent view. The music is provided by a Wurlitzer organ. Frank Langlois is the house manager. Business is so good that upon the capitalization of $50,000, the management expects to pay from 24 to 36 per cent. dividends per year.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Our Asiatic Commissioner.

ONCE we said a whole lot of nice things about our Around-the-World Commissioner, but we've shown just one photograph from him thus far, and the second is not such a lot better. This is it.

Cut Deleted by Censors.

He admits himself that he has seen better pictures, and he promises to do better next time, but what are you going to do with a man out in China who is doing his best. Of course it is Homer Croy. We are not starting to throw any rocks at one of the nicest chaps that ever drew the breath of life, but it was announced that he was going around the world for Leslie's to write the aforesaid world up in humorous fashion, and by the time he got to China and his stuff started to run, all Europe got into a wrangle, and Croy can't look in anywhere. Mind you, we do not charge Croy with having anything to do with it; frankly we do not believe that he did, but the moment they heard of it—well, read the evening extra.

Will some people with money please note that time seems to be ripe in the Occident. In a recent personal letter Mr. Croy is as enthusiastic and in the letter that covers his copy this time he writes: "I don't know why some of the overcrowded exhibitors in America don't tear out here and open a house. There are barrels in it—HOGSHEADS. China is just where the United States was twelve years ago."

Now this is not precisely what the Consular Reports say, but we have a lot of faith in Croy as an observer; a greater faith than we have in a consular service that cannot bring, in all cases, a trained judgment in show facts, and yet even they say that money is to be made with stuff costing ten dollars a reel.

Before we ask you to read what Croy has written, we'll remark he is headed for British India, where he hopes he can make better photographs. Here is what he writes:

> It has been a constant surprise to me how modern and up to date the moving picture theaters are in China. I had supposed that they were alleyways with seats, but instead of that they are electric lighted and fanned.
>
> The Chinese are wild about motion pictures. They just can't get enough of them. They'll spend their last cent to go. But the programs are quite different from what they are back home. A Chinaman doesn't want to drop in, see a few feet and go out again; he makes a ceremony of going to pictures; he goes at seven and stays until midnight. A Chinese is as patient as a phlegmatic pyramid, so he wants to stay until the last flicker. If the show stops before half past eleven he feels that he isn't getting his money's worth. For that reason they have long programs in China. A house rarely runs under seven reels, and many of them put on ten. The admission is thirty cents. (Mex?)
> There are two kinds of picture theaters in China: the ones the whites go to, and the ones for the natives. The Europeans are wild about moving pictures, too. There isn't much in the way of entertainment in China, so the Americans and English people here flock to a picture show as if it were the Manhattan Opera. They go in evening clothes and have a wine supper afterward. The whites have to pay seventy-five good hard cents to go to a picture theater in China.
>
> The China exhibitors go at their advertising in quite a different way from what we do in the United States. They post up small signs with a great deal of reading on them instead of using large billboards as we do and only a few flaring words. This is because the Chinese, being so patient, will stop to read an ad, no difference how long it is. An American would only glance at the headline, but a Chinese will go close up to the wall and painstakingly read it to the end.
> All the theaters have advertising on their programs. Sometimes, I must say, it is pretty hard to find the program in the congestion of advertising.
> The French films have been having their own way out here until just recently, but now American films are getting a double hand grip. They all want cowboy films. Just the announcement that a cowboy film is to be shown will fill the theater.
> The nicest picture theater I have seen since I left America was one in Hongkong the Victoria. It is superior to a whole lot of so-called classy ones in America. It has a full orchestra. This theater is patronized by the whites and the better-to-do Chinese.
> The average theater run by Chinese and for Chinese is surprisingly good. There are thirteen motion picture theaters in Canton alone, and with that the field in China is only touched. Every exhibitor in China has a smile and a Packard.

But before you pack and buy a ticket, remember there are few China towns. The interior does not yet want the stuff at all. Mr. Croy is a close observer, but he sees a little bit into the future and he forgets tell you to go slowly. He is telling NOW what all will be telling a couple of years from now, but if you go now, be prepared to do a little missionary work. The great fact remains that all of interior China is rapidly opening up. Mr. Croy is the first man "of ours" to see this and pass the word. Keep an eye on things, but do not go unless you are prepared to be a missionary and spend money in missionary work against the time you get the return.

This Program Sells.

The Program, of San Antonio, Texas, appears to be a publication that is sold at the various houses, to judge from the back page advertisement, though there is neither editorial heading nor price mark. It may be that the advertisement is merely to give the publication a fictitious value, but no letter of explanation accompanies the paper and we can only guess. The sheet carries program and film stories for three theaters and a distinctly vicious question box. It is probable that the answers are faked, but even at that, or perhaps because of that, they should have been done better. One advises a supposed sufferer from tuberculosis to apply to some quack for a nostrum that will cure, another states that the address of a physician has been sent to the inquirer, and so on. It is nastily cheap. The combination program for several houses is a good thing, but the tone of the sheet should be kept clean. The aim of the program seems to be to get enough matter to fill sixteen pages. Something better than that is needed as an aim.

We Agree.

William E. Furber, pressman for the American Feature Film Company of Boston, sends in some stuff from the Imperial theater, St. Johns, N. B., that one of their men brought back with him. He thinks it is too good to be kept just for their own house organ, which circulates only in their New England territory It is the work of Walter H. Golding, and we agree with Mr. Furber that he could make good in a larger field.

One of the pieces is the opening program, the front lettered in black on a banner outlined in crimson and gold; a rich and tasteful effect because the use of color has been held down. Evidently the expense of this rather costly issue was taken up by the advertisements of the various persons who were engaged in the building of the house. The advertisements, however, do not intrude on the text. There is a full page cut of the theater on the second page, facing a salutatory. Follows a vignette of the old Lyceum, which formerly occupied the site with a historical sketch, and facing this are five photographs of the Imperial in various stages of completion. The program follows, the Lieutenant Governor being the patron, and the proceeds being divided between the Catholic and Protestant orphanages.

Later there was issued a folder alphabetically arranged of all of those present. This is an oddity that might be imitated.

Advertising The Trey o' Hearts, was run in the St. John's Globe, the house issuing a folder showing the front page of the paper with a half-tone of the theater set into the page, is an odd and effective arrangement. Inside a page is given that attraction and a page and a half to a list of underlined features. It is clean cut work; the sort of work that counts. We hope that Mr. Golding will put us on the list direct.

War Slides.

Mr. Furber, in his house organ, Film Facts, makes a useful suggestion. Here it is:

> I wonder how many theaters are taking advantage of the present war by throwing slides on their curtains at convenient intervals telling the progress of the fighting up to the minute. This wouldn't be so difficult in cities of any size where the local newspaper has an A. P. A. wire. And if there doesn't happen to be one in your city you can telephone to the largest city in your vicinity and get enough information to fill twenty slides, all of which may prove a bigger attraction if advertised than anything you could secure. It's the alert manager who utilizes all these little stunts for getting patronage who gets the business and a fat salary. All others still draw a janitor's envelope.

Says It's Free.

H. A. Chenoweth, of the Shawmut theater, Boston, sends in a new stunt in the shape of an envelope of the kind known as "pay" envelopes, the cheap manila sort that are large enough to contain folded bills. In this case the envelope is printed up in this fashion:

FREE ?

Information

DON'T OPEN
CONTENTS TOO PLEASING

The enclosure is a herald for a coming attraction. Curiosity is strong in most make-ups, and the envelopes will all be opened, but in addition to the herald there should have been a card or slip that could be taken in at a single glance. Some, feeling themselves fooled, will not closely read the herald, though it is largely pictorial, but they will read a single striking statement. While the word "free" should be as large as possible, the "information" should be in very small type—what is known as four-point box-head Gothic.

The same question mark and another are all that are to be seen at first in another advertisement except the words "Should a woman tell?" A small red heart-shaped seal fastens the folder together. As this is unwound, it reveals in order five boxes each asking a question suggested by the play of that title. The sheet is 22 inches long by 7¾ inches wide, printed on one side and folded the long way. This is then folded over on itself seven times, making eight divisions. It is better calculated to hold the interest than a herald, and after you have read the questions, you turn the sheet and read the straight announcement.

Mr. Chenoweth would do well to change printers. A man who will set a job like this either lacks a proper variety of type faces or is wanting in intelligence. The same fault shows in other matter sent in, though perhaps Mr. Chenoweth contributes to the fault by trying to get too much into a given space.

A Weekly Ticket.

J. W. Bowser, of the Pastime theater, Tuscumbia, Ala., sends in a weekly ticket which can be used in different ways. The tickets consist of a stub and four coupons, covering the days from Monday to Friday inclusive, the Monday coupon being, of course, on the end of the ticket and the Friday admission on the stub. The stub carries the name of the house and the wording, "Special weekly school (or adult) ticket. Not good after (a line for the date to be written or stamped in). Each date strip good for that day only." The coupons read:

Pastime theater.
Good only for Monday.
Not good if detached.

Each coupon gives a different day, of course, and different colors mark the school and adult tickets.

Sold at a slight reduction, say five admissions for the price of four, it brings money to the house early and offsets weather conditions. They may also be given as prizes by teachers or stores, can be used to particular advantage where a series will be presented entire within a week, and can be made to work in many other ways. Lots of times a man or woman will come if they already have a ticket where they would not otherwise.

Mr. Bowser adds that the printer would like to know what he can do to improve the tickets. We do not see that any improvement is needed. Stock, display, choice of type and perforation are all up to the mark. The stock is seven inches by two, heavy colored card, each coupon being seven-eighths of an inch.

Why, Here's Williams!

Bertram D. Williams has shown up at last, making his debut from the Picto theater, Athens, Tenn. Right away he got busy and sent well printed invitations to the betrothal of Lottie May Briscoe to Albert Sidney Johnson. These were sent to a reception of the Browning circle, each being addressed to one of the ladies present and made something of a sensation. It was an advertisement for Lubin's "Kiss Me Good Night." Being a printing expert, Williams had the invitation set in Gothic and not in Old English. That invitation stunt is a good idea for one time.

Just as a suggestion; Williams seems to have picked up some ready stamped initial paper. It is not expensive and gives all the eclat of a special embossing.

Reserving Seats.

The Princess theater, Henderson, N. C., is reserving seats without extra charge when features are presented. As the house has a uniform number of seats in each row, it was an easy matter to make a diagram of the house by using rule. Facing the diagram is this announcement:

> We have been asked why we could not reserve seats. This can be carried out very satisfactorily. On the opposite page is a diagram of the arrangement of seats. Seventeen rows of eleven seats each. These rows are numbered from 1 to 17. Make your selection, call 'Phone No. 110 (Henderson Book Company) or No. 451 (Princess), state in what row you wish to sit and we will reserve these for you until either 7:30 or 9 o'clock, at which time each performance begins. Each show will last about one and a half hours. The admission for "A Good Little Devil" is 25 cents for adults, 15 cents for children.

Where there is a varying number of seats, it is possible to produce a plan cheaply with rule and figures alone, something like this, a double aisle house being used as the example:

1 .....S  C  9.....  .....18  C  19.. .....26
1.....7   B  10.....  .....17  B  18.....24
1.....6   A  7.....  .....16  A  17.....22

Any printer can get this up. If there is a newspaper office with a stereotyping plant in town, the type can be sent over and a matrix made from which any number of cuts may be cast. We are coming to the reserved seat idea and it would be as well to accustom patrons to the idea quickly.

The Right Idea.

The cross page cut shows the lower floor of the Orpheum theater, Gardner, Mass., with an appeal to the kiddies. The letter from F. D. Stanton, the resident manager, explains the idea.

> The enclosed photograph shows only our main floor. Don't you call it a pretty good flashlight? Of course you know that we used the old stunt of advertising the fact that the children are to have their pictures taken and then announce that the pictures are to be given out free the following Saturday.
> The advantage of using a good photo like the enclosed instead of the usual cheap photo is that many adults will buy them and another is that the good one will be taken care of instead of being thrown away in disappointment.

There is a lot of thought back of the suggestion that a good photograph will be retained where the botch will be thrown away and at no time do the house any real good. The photograph sent is well printed on double weight paper that requires no mounting. Probably the cost of the prints was not much greater than the cost of an inferior job, and for the slight extra cost is had a real advertisement and one that will be retained in hundreds of homes. Mr. Stanton also sends a hanger for The Trey o' Hearts that plays up the features in capital shape. One kicker reads:

> If you were a girl and > hated a man, what motive could > make you try to kill your sister > on his account?

The following matter explains that the only way to discover the answer is to see the play. Another line reads:

> We would send free tickets and a taxi for you rather than have any of our friends miss this stupendous drama.

If they feel that way about it, the reader is apt to argue that the story must be really worth while and hustle to get in on chapter one.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Vocation and Avocation.

THIS is not very different from other letters constantly received, but it states matters more clearly. The writer asks:

> I have several scripts which some editors have pronounced good, and yet I do not seem able to find a sale for them. Is there such a slump in the present demand that if a promising playwright has another means of livelihood he had better take advantage of it?

Now there are two sides of the answer to this. The most important one is this: There is not now and has never yet been a sufficient demand for photoplay scripts from the general market to warrant any writer in seeking to gain a livelihood from photoplays alone unless he has what virtually amounts to a contract. Until the writer has for some time gained from photoplay writing an income in excess of that accruing from his daily employment, it is an error to throw aside the vocation for the avocation. This has been the case, and always will be the case, in photoplay as it is in fiction. There are comparatively few persons who derive a satisfactory income from writing fiction stories alone. There are fewer who can accomplish the same result in photoplay, because the market is smaller. And the more experienced the writer, the less apt he is to trust to one medium alone.

Let us consider the photoplay market, a moment. It is, first of all, useless to reckon with the feature film companies. Most of their work is done in the studio or by writers who are told precisely what to write. They are not in the general market, for their needs are few and peculiar.

This leaves perhaps 90 to 125 subjects a week released on program. Of the Licensed releases, there are four companies largely served by staff writers, though practically all will purchase from the outside if good stuff presents itself.

Universal trusts largely to the scheme of hiring directors who write their own productions. The market here is very small.

Most of the Mutual companies are in the market, though some of them make but few purchases from outsiders. It is a liberal estimate to say that thirty to forty scripts are purchased from the outside each week. There are a hundred or more writers who regularly produce purchasable stuff. Many of them must take turns. When writers work up to a certain standard they are either put on staff or what virtually amounts to a staff position. Until that time they cannot command a steady income.

It is foolish, then, for any writer, to abandon a steady income for a precarious one. Just as a matter of fact few regular writers not actually on salary (in opposition to staff writers who are paid by the script) have not some work that brings them a regular income.

One brilliant writer gives a couple of hours a day to an advertising agency looking over their material and giving a final revise. Another is in the Railway Mail Service. William Lord Wright runs a daily paper and does special work. Roy McCardell has only lately given up all but his "Jarr" and syndicate stuff with the New York World, and at that he still has a dozen irons in the fire. One man is a printer, another a physician, a third a dentist. All, in spite of their staff position, do other and more certain work. The same holds good in a more general sense in fiction work. Not more than two per cent. of the writers look to fiction alone for their incomes. They know the uncertainties of the work and they are well assured of a permanent success before they cut loose from their other work. E. W. Matlack probably makes more money from scripts than he does from train dispatching, but he knows the latter job will last year after year.

Now to get to the second point, the selling: An editor may pronounce a script to be good and yet not buy it because it does not suit him. A second editor may find another point of objection, and so it goes until a good script has been the rounds unpurchased. It is still a good script, but not an available one. At this moment the market is somewhat contracted because of the foolish war scare, but at best the author is at the mercy of fewer than fifty persons. He must suit one or more of them or make no sale. It is still a precarious business. Editors are but human and have their likes and dislikes. The good script is apt to land eventually, but it must be a really good script and not merely one the author likes and one editor says is good. The business is and always will be a survival of the fittest, and it is up to each writer to make himself one of the fittest, and not only that one but one of the leaders. What was good a year ago is moderately poor now, and what was considered good four years ago would be regarded as hopeless now. The business progresses, and while it is growing bigger and broader, it is also growing more exacting. One must keep up with the procession.

Until you can be certain of making at least $3,000 a year, because that was what you made last year, stick to the little old job that pays off regularly and make photoplay, or fiction or dramatic writing your avocation. You'll eat more regularly and have a greater peace of mind. If a man who earns between $8,000 and $10,000 a year with various forms of fiction and photoplay can still cling to cigar advertising, you do not have to feel that you must cut loose the first time you make five or six sales in one month.

That Telegraph Contest.

Roy L. McCardell won the first prize in the Morning Telegraph prize comedy script contest. Miss Elaine Sterne, who won the first in the Vitagraph contest, was second and Miss Caroline B. Wells (not the Fluffy Ruffles lady) was third. A second McCardell script was "in the money," but in fairness it was decided to accept the script at the third prize price and allot the third to Miss Wells. The winners have been paid and the other matters will be adjusted promptly. The contest was decided in less than a month from the time of its closing. All three winners are practical and experienced writers. Mr. McCardell, the same week the contest was announced, also won the weekly award from Puck for the best contribution for that week.

From the Prize Winner.

It seems to be fashionable to print the remarks of the prize winner when a contest is ended. We neglected to get Miss Sterne's impressions on the Sun-Vitagraph contest, but a recent letter from Roy L. McCardell, winner of first prize in the Telegraph-Chartered Theaters contest is more interesting than a formal article would be. In congratulating Mr. McCardell on his new honor we added that we had seen none of his recent scripts and that a couple of staff men had declared that he had no technique at all. In reply he writes:

> I am afraid that the one or two who say my scripts are bad may be right. Of course I'll let you read or look over any of my home copies, but I would rather you took twenty minutes out of the first Sunday you spent with us, so I could have your opinion on some half dozen one and two-reelers sold. I have none unsold that I would now try to sell. As a matter of fact, I have very little if any "technique." I simply try to describe a story to be told in pantomime by actors before the camera—try to describe it as I see it in my mind's eye, so the director and actors can see it, and after they have seen and depicted it, that the audience seeing it on the screen will follow the story with such interest that, despite the fact it is in dumb show, they will subconsciously think they are seeing and THINK they are hearing real people saying and doing real and interesting things. That's all and the only way I know how to write a pictureplay.
> Your department helps me, has always helped me. It has helped every writer who makes his salt at selling scenarios. I do not think it harms the boobs; they would be wasting their foolish time at something else. My definition of a boob is the silly folk who want all the rewards without taking the pains to grow some brains first. The first foundation of any measure of reward in photoplay writing is years of reading and mind developing. All the technical instruction in the world will not supply the lack of those two things. At that, there are only about half a dozen M. P. companies on the level about buying mss. But better days are coming. I do not want to write a long letter, but have much to tell you when I see you, regarding the gentle art of photoplaywriting—it's rewards and it disappointments.
> Another good friend and instructor of mine is Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, who has done very much for me. He sometimes writes me several pages of constructive criticism. You bet he knows. He thinks and works. He not only writes himself but he is always on the job and he sees the efforts of himself and others in the studio and the result on the screen. I am proud of the fact that my work has been good enough to interest the real workers, the real takers and makers of pictures like Blackton. I realize THEY KNOW and am guided by them.
> I have been most fortunate in my instructors. My first teacher was Wallace McCutcheon, than whom there was none better in his day. Bitzer and Walter Marvin on the camera, Long, now of Kalem, but then the technical man of Biograph, later on Edwin Porter, of Edison and Rex and Famous Players and Blackton!
> Besides all this, I study the pictures all I can. Kalem has some wonderful camera effects, and there is no gainsaying the great genius of David Griffith. His "The Avenging Conscience" and "Judith of Berthula" were masterpieces. And yet I know a supposedly noted scenario writer who boasted to me he "didn't need to go to see anybody's picture," and utterly refused to go to see "Cabiria" or any of Griffith's work! Can you beat it? But I see his finish. He is a man touted as one of the best ever! But he is NOT, and he is going back while you look at him. After he talked that way to me I looked him up in the M. P. World Film Reviews, for the past year. If his employers ever read it over they would blink a little. Well, I tried not to write you a long letter, but here it is again!

We disagree with Mr. McCardell on his proposition that there are so few companies really buying scripts, but we are with him on the definition of the boob, in fact it is the best definition of the genus that we have yet seen—the man who wants reward without work.

Just in passing, Mr. McCardell has resigned his long connection with the editorial staff of the New York World and in the future will supply them only with his Mr. and Mrs. Jarr feature and his syndicate stuff The relief from the routine work of the Metropolitan section will give him time for his more important activities, but like all old timers he has clung to the harness long after the necessity was past.

Chicago Open.

The former coroner of the Inquest Circle in Chicago writes that he is going to conduct his organization independent of the parent body. There is an opening in Chicago for an Inquest Circle if any experienced writer wishes to qualify.

Have You

Have you yet written stories about

Swelling Up.

Everyone has read the fable of the frog that tried to swell up to the size of the ox, but many who know the story fail to realize that they have been burst open by the same trouble. Probably it will do no good to set the storm signals, but it's a grave mistake to get all puffed up over a first acceptance. One stingy little check has sounded the knell of many who might have progressed to success had they held in, but they had sold a script, they argued that they knew it all, they stopped studying—and they died.

The time to work hardest is after the first acceptance. Let it be an encouragement instead of a detriment. Realize that some fortunate accident and not your own great merit may have guided the acceptance and in time, if you keep on working, you will write scripts that are purchased because they are wholly good and not because they possess merely the germ of a good idea. Only the other day one of the Circle Coroners sent in a letter from a recent member resigning her membership. She had sold a script and so no longer needed any help. And that same day a man who has written some of the real dramatic successes of the past few years told us it was getting harder and harder for him to keep up with the procession and give his scripts the more refined touches that the best producers now demand.

One of these two was wrong. Which one?

Getting Back at Miss Brown.

For the benefit of others who have tried or who may wish to try the scheme of writing plays seen on the screen and then studying these, the man who originally found success by this method replies to recent comment. It might be explained that his vocation is one calling for a highly developed memory, and this training enabled him to practically reproduce from memory what he saw the night before. This is one of the essentials of the system, for, as he points out, it is necessary that the student should feel the appeal of the play, should realize the effect it has upon him and his fellows in an audience to the end that the story may be studied intelligently. The system has placed him among the leaders. It may not work as well with others. He writes:

> I note in the current issue of the Moving Picture World that Miss Brown takes a dainty little rap at my idea of rewriting the best of the stories I saw for purposes of study. Of course, your remarks parried the rap so far as I was concerned but I believe that the idea is misunderstood and I want to make it more clear for the benefit of those who might want to use it.
> To begin with, I want to disclaim that the idea is a cure-all for every case of photoplay failure. It is nothing of the kind. It was devised by me to suit my own peculiar needs. I already had imagination—I could build a plot around a brick-bat. I had a little versatility (inventiveness) and a small pinch of hard sense. Yet I couldn't connect. I wondered how the successful men did it and I devised this scheme to find out.
> Let me put the idea in a way that will make its value a little more vivid. Untie your imagination, come with me and let us take a glance at Mr. Mud's morning mail. He has eighteen letters. Each letter is from a successful photoplaywright. Each writer offers to loan Mr. Mud his best script for study purposes. (Now you know why I said to untie your imagination).
> Would Mr. Mud be tickled. Oh, no; Mr. Mud would take it quite calmly. He would merely throw five or six fits and let out a few hundred whoops of joy that would make the "Rickety-rax" of a football squad sound like a great silence. It would not excite Mr. Mud a bit.
> Well, that is just what I proposed that the idea should do for me. I wanted those eighteen scripts for study. Of course, the busy writers would have been delighted to have loaned me carbons of scripts, would probably have put special delivery stamps on their envelopes; but I hadn't the nerve to ask for them. How much better it was to go to the screen and get them myself.
> Of course, it meant work to do this rewriting. But I had been looking old man Failure in the eye so long that the old reprobate had begun to wink at me. What was a little work compared to the constant companionship and growing familiarity of this miserable old wretch?
> The method is simple. You simply go to the shows and enjoy the pictures as well as any of those little savages up in the gallery. At your first opportunity, you choose the story that you have liked best and begin to rewrite it. When you have finished, you have a script that you know is acceptable. If you merely wrote a similar story as Miss Brown advises, you would be sure of nothing.
> The script is finished and the study of it is now in order. No set rules for study can be given because no two persons will approach the script with the same needs. Each student must study it to obtain the things he individually needs. Gradually, as script after script is studied, the untellable things of the writing game begin to take form in the student's mind. His own original work will take on more strength and dignity, his development will stick more closely to a given thread of continuity, his mastery of situation will be more apparent. In a word, his work will become professional in tone.
> But I do not think much of the short-hand stunt. Aside from the difficulty of making reliable notes in a dark room, the writing will distract the attention of the student from the pure enjoyment of the pictures and he will find when he comes to study the script, that he has no vivid recollections of deep sympathies and thrills or of hearty laughs to guide him in his judgment of the material he has gathered. Personally, I see no substitute for the memory in this work. Believe me, it is not nearly so difficult as it looks from the road. You may safely take this little memory secret as authoritative. Your memory will do just what you force it to do—no more—and, once started, its cumulative power is amazing. I feel perfectly safe in saying that any normal person can, at the first attempt, rewrite a one-reeler from memory with sufficient accuracy for all practical purposes. By the time he has done his fifth script he can reproduce a two-reeler satisfactorily.
> The chief drawback of this work is not the memory work involved. It is the immense amount of seemingly profitless labor that one must perform. I would not hide for a minute, the fact that it means a lot of work. Especially I would warn off those who would only dabble in it. The dabbler will only lose his time and labor. As in advertising, the returns are to be obtained only by the cumulative results of hammering persistence. Only those who are as desperate as I was will be willing to go the whole route for it is no gentle snap. But if even one struggler can use it to find success, I shall feel amply repaid for pounding out this letter.

All There.

Mrs. Bertie Moyer sends in a script written by her little daughter. She left a sheet of paper in the machine and when she came back she found this:

Jimmie Happy at First.

1. Store—Jimmie Eegs mama to by firework—mama buys them
2. Back yard—Jimmie lites them.
3. Grave yard—Jimmies mama and papa put flours on Jimmies grave.
4. Heaven Jimmie in heaven wishing he was at home with mama and papa.

The End of jimmie.

The continuity is somewhat abrupt, but the small lady certainly got it all in and she started with the start and carried it home to the finish. This is something to laugh at, but there's a lesson in it, too.

Sensing Plots.

Learn to sense your plot; to know what the plot is, where it commences and where it ends. "Blank is all right," explained a director lately, "but sometimes he stops his script about the time the story starts and sometimes he writes about what happened the next day." In other words the author knew that there must be a story somewhere around the idea he had, but he did not know precisely what the plot was. He has not yet cultivated the plot sense. Sometimes he starts too soon and sometimes too late. A plot is not a life history, but merely some part of a life story. There is danger of lapping over into the next series of events or of getting back of the story that is to be told. Sometimes the story is started with such elaboration that when things really begin to happen they must be crowded into too small a space. Sometimes not enough of the story is taken up to run the length and the action is run well past the climax. Find out what a plot is. Learn to recognize it at sight and then you'll know when and where to start and when to stop.

How Many?

"How many others would stick to a thing four years, without remuneration, to have four or five accepted?" is the way L. H. Van Patten ends his comment, and frankly we wonder, too. We worked more than four years without a fiction sale, but the percentage of "stickers" in photoplay writers is small indeed. Mr. Van Patten adds:

> You might say to some of the growling photoplaywrights that continually bawl about their hard luck, that they ought to come out here to this country where people don't lay down on a job, if they don't "tear the world wide open" the first time they start to do something. I myself wrote nothing but masterpieces (?) for a year with the usual result, but the last two years I have been working them up, and haven't sent out any. It isn't very profitable yet, but I am sure of one thing, some of the editors like me better for it. I expect to plot and write for about a year yet, without sending out anything, and then out of about a hundred or so, I will probably send out a dozen that I consider good, and will try to be harsh in judging, too.

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will full manuscripts or synopses be criticized, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply by mail without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department, one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money, or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 56.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

What purpose does insulation accomplish? Tell us exactly what insulation really does. "Confines the current to the wires" is not sufficient. Explain why the current needs confining, and exactly what would take place if it were not confined. It is the fundamental idea I am after. Suppose the negative side of a circuit carrying 10,000 volts (or any other voltage for that matter) to be thoroughly and completely insulated, could you stand on the wet ground and pick up the positive wire with your bare hands without danger? Explain your answer.

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question 50 consists of Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington; L. C. LaGrow, Albany, New York, and Montreal, Canada; John Solar, Watertown, New York; M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas; C. A. Webster, Carterville, Missouri; J. Erwin Roberts, Nashville, Tennessee, Minneapolis, Minn., and Cleveland, Ohio.

I have selected the reply of L. C. LaGrow, supplemented by portions of replies by others for publication.

Answer to Question No. 50.

By L. C. LAGROW, Albany, N. Y.

The Question:

Suppose you count the strands of your asbestos-covered lamp leads and find there are 246 of them, each measuring 10/1000 of an inch in diameter. What would you conclude? What number wire would it be? What number wire is usually used for strands in asbestos-covered lamp leads? Give the rule for figuring size of wire necessary for three-wire circuits.

The Answer:

I would conclude that my employer was being defrauded two ways, and I was being fooled. The lamp leads would probably have been installed as No. 6, and I would, no doubt, have been using it as such. But the area of a No. 6 wire is 26244 c. m., whereas the lead in question would have an area of only 24600 c. m., which I would have found by squaring the diameter of the strands, and multiplying that result by the number of strands. The fraudulent wire would be 1644 circular mills short of a No. 6, for which size it would undoubtedly have been sold, since it would be 8216 circular mills greater than a No. 8. My employer therefore paid for copper he did not get, and, moreover, is paying for current which is being dissipated in heat by reason of the increased resistance caused by the wire not being up to size, and I, the operator, would probably be wondering why I could not bring my light up to the efficiency the amperage I am supposed to be using ought to produce. As to what number wire it would be, why it would not be any number, unless we call it a fraudulent No. 6

No. 30 wire is usually used for the strands of asbestos-covered lamp leads. As to figuring the size of wire necessary for three-wire circuits, why the three-wire circuit is in effect two two-wire systems coupled together, and, due to the fact that the effect is that the lamps, motors, etc., run in series on 220 volts, we can figure the amperage as being only half that of a two-wire system carrying the same wattage load. Another way of putting it is that, all incandescent lights, motors, etc., being in series with each other, and since wattage divided by voltage equals amperage, we have to provide transportation facilities for amperage equal to wattage divided by 220. It therefore follows that wires of one-fourth the c. m. area necessary to carry the same load on the two-wire system would be sufficient.

[All of which is correct as far as it goes, but Brother LaGrow did not go quite far enough. A. C. Stewart in dealing with this phase of the matter says -Ed.]:

In figuring wire sizes for three-wire circuits of 110-220 volts, proceed the same as for two-wire 110-volt circuit carrying an equal load, and then divide the circular mills by 4, which will give the necessary size for the two outside wires. If it be an outdoor circuit the middle or neutral wire may be only half as large, but if the circuit be indoors or inside then the National Code requires that the middle wire shall be the same size as either outside wires.

Brother Larmour has also dealt very fully with this phase of the matter, and several correspondents seem to have an idea that the neutral wire might be considerably smaller than the two outside wires, particularly if it be an outdoor circuit, whereas Brother Larmour wound up by saying: "However, the best arrangements, though costing more to install, is to make the neutral wire twice the size of one of the outside wires, so that in case of emergency the circuit can be used as a two-wire system by connecting the two outside wires together, and using the neutral wire as the other wire of a two-wire system." I cannot agree with Brother Larmour in this. I think the scheme would be costly and of no particular value. The method given by Brother Larmour for finding the necessary size of the outside wires is correct, and for various reasons the neutral should be the same size, though it is quite true that under any ordinary conditions it could not possibly be called upon to carry much more than one-half the load. However, supposing something happened to one of the outside wires. If the neutral wire was half the size of the outside wires then you could only use one side of the circuit, but if the neutral was of equal size with the outside wire then considerable additional load could be connected temporarily to the side which was working. The point intended to be brought out, however, was: Do you know how to figure the size of wires for the three-wire system so that in case you are employed as an operator and told to superintend the construction and wiring of the operating room you will be able to determine for yourself whether or not the three-wire operating room feeders are large enough to carry the load without a heavy drop in voltage or excessive heating. Brother LaGrow said that all lamps, motors, etc., would work in series. This is not strictly correct since the load is seldom or never exactly balanced.

A Lens Protector.

J. K. Seay, Norfolk, Virginia, has what seems to be a feasible scheme for protecting the back end of the lens of Powers Six machines from being splattered with oil. He made a tin tube, long enough to reach from the back side of the aperture plate to the end of the lens tube and telescope over the tube a sufficient distance to hold it in place; or, at least that is how I understand the sketch he sent in. The scheme, providing it will work out in practice, looks to me like a good one. It would not be necessary to have the tube extend right up against the aperture plate. As a matter of fact, with all due respect to my good friends the Nicholas Power Company, I believe they could very easily attach an oil protector which would prevent oil splattering on the lens, as it often does. Of course, oil splattering is primarily the fault of the operator, who slops oil all over everything, instead of just putting one drop on the bearing. I must again take occasion to say to operators that there is not a bearing on a motion picture machine which is not amply lubricated by one drop of oil. One drop of oil will do just as much good in the way of lubrication as a pint would, and anything more than that simply runs, or flies off, and makes a dirty mess. I went into an operating room not so very long ago, and while I was there the operator oiled his machine. If it had not been for the resultant damage it would have been funny. He had a squirt can that must have held a pint, and he would stick the snout of it into a little oil hole that could not possibly be made to hold more than one drop, and then came the deluge. Of course, it is not hard to guess what happened to the film that went through that machine, and with a projector in which the back end of the lens tube in unprotected most likely the definition of the picture on the screen would range from poor to worse, due to oil on the lens. Did I say anything to this particular man? I did not. What's the use talking to a man who has no more sense than that.

A Stunt.

M. E. Carner, Willits, California, orders a Handbook and says:

> I have a stunt which works to perfection, and will be valuable to the operator who is unable to see the top of his picture. It is simple and consists of two mirrors placed so that the lower one reflects the picture up into the top one, so located that the operator can see it without interfering with his direct view.

I should suppose the scheme of Brother Carner's could be worked out into a pretty good proposition by making an auxiliary opening near the floor of the operating room, locating a mirror therein, and directly above it place a ground glass to receive the reflected image. I do not know, but it strikes me this ought to work pretty good. Of course, the two mirrors would give results; there is no question about that.

A Whale of a Lot.

L. F. Guimond, of the Monticello Amusement Company, Monticello, New York, writes very entertainingly as follows:

If you ever get another inquiry from a fathead manager who is not willing to take the word of the department in the matter of home-made aluminum screens you are at liberty to advise him that, in addition to your own opinion, which ought to have some weight, he is at liberty to write to me, and I'll send him a sample of a home-made screen, the same being the result of consultations with painters, operators, managers and near-managers. It surely is a work of art. We dampened and stretched the muslin and painted on enough aluminum paint to please even our 16 to 1 friend, at present signed up with the Chautauqua circuit. Net result just exactly what you opined: i.e., nit, not, no, minus, nothing doing; plus the cost of the experiment, which amounted to quite some. We now have what we want; a regular screen, covered with Brightasday Emulsion, which same I can recommend as the best thing we have seen at a figure to fit the pocket book of the small exhibitor. You wanted to know the result of our experiment, and I have taken my typewriter in my arms to acknowledge the fact that Ole Abe was correct when he said: "It's better not to know so much, than to know so much that isn't so." Never again!

And now about that matter of yellow edges and blue centers with the meniscus-bi-convex lenses. We most emphatically did move the lamp house, and we moved it all over a ten-acre lot, too, and spaced the lenses from 1/16 of an inch apart to [illegible] capacity of the holder. Results as before mentioned with the home-made screen wonder. Now, I hate to tell you what we have finally succeeded in getting in getting good results with, for it seems ridiculous, but we found we got the best light with the meniscus set in the Preddey mount and the plano in front—just a plain, little, old fashioned plano. Ask me not why. I dunno. But that is what we are using, and we are getting away with it, too.

And now please pass it along to Mr. Sargent that we are very wroth over something he said about us. Although the half-tone cut might give that impression, we really are not an "old church or armory," but a brand new honest-to-goodness theater, erected just about fourteen months ago, at a total cost, with everything ready to open the doors, of about $35,000, and this is going some in a town of approximately 2,000. The land happens to be "ourn," and an eighteen-room residence adjoins. We just dropped the theater right down into the front yard, as we had a two hundred and twenty foot frontage, and set it back from the street for purely artistic reasons. We are well advertised, and every one in the surrounding country knows what and where "Behind the Cobble Wall" indicates. The stage has a clearance of forty feet to the grids, and we can stage anything from "The Whip" to "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and throw in the dogs and ice with the latter. Our front elevation is still unfinished, but you can rest assured that when we get our final coat of panelled stucco we will look more like a theater and less like a glorified barn.

Our record with your advertisers is quite some. Everything purchased originated from reading advertisements in the Moving Picture World, is as follows: Laemmle, Meniscus bi-convex lenses, six sets; Laemmle, Brightasday; Kliene, carbons and catalogue of accessories; Preddey mount; carbon economizers; these are things we bought, and I am now in correspondence with the Canfield Engine Company, Charles A. Strelinger, Gundlach-Manhattan Optical Company, J. H. Genter Company, and other of your advertisers. If all your subscribers are equally curious your advertisers must get a whale of a lot of results from the use of the Moving Picture Worl[illegible] pages.

Now that is what I call a whale of a good letter. It comes from a man who is willing to admit it when he makes a blunder, and, by admitting it warn others against doing the same thing. As to the lens proposition, suppose you try the plano next to the arc with the bi-convex in front. I am a bit inclined to believe that it is possible that the plano next to the arc with the bi-convex in front will deliver as good or maybe even better results than the meniscus-bi-convex. I by no means know that this is true, mind you, but I "have suspicions." I do not see any reason why the meniscus lens should have any considerable advantage when used in conjunction with a plano. In fact, it seems to me as though it ought to work out just the other way. The proof of the pudding, though, is in the eating, and if you are getting good results with that combination I suppose it is up to me to shut up; but first please try the bi-convex in place of the plano.

The comment of Brother Epes Winthrop, to which Friend Guimond takes exception, appears on page 1767, September 26th issue, but after reading the same, and the paragraph just above it, why you certainly realize that it is up to me to keep quiet and let you and Sargent fight it out. Sargent has spiked my guns—darn 'im. But at the head of the aforesaid article Sargent says something (Oh, yes, I am willing to admit that Sargent does really say something once in a while), which I have got to elaborate on a little. The article is headed: "Can It Be?" and Epes remarks in his prelude: "Here is a man in a town all by himself, and still he writes he is trying to give his patrons the very best. Probably that is why he IS left in possession of the town. There is no use in trying to break in on a house like that."

Neither Epes Winthrop Sargent nor anyone else ever made a truer statement. But the average exhibitor seems to be utterly, totally and completely unable to grasp so simple an idea. A man gets a field all to himself, perhaps a section in a city, perhaps a small town. Now if he had competition he would lie awake nights trying to figure out ways to improve his show, and get business away from the "other fellow," but if he has no competition any lying awake nights he does is because the days aren't long enough for him to dope out all the possible ways to reduce expenses, and usually they are reduced below the point where it is possible to put on a really good show, or below the point where it is possible to put on even a decent show. The people put up with a rotten performance and patronize his house—yes, because there is nowhere else to go, but by and by some wise guy sizes things up, and Mr. Squeeze-a-Nickel wakes up to find he has opposition. He then possibly gets busy improving his show, but it is probably too late. The way to keep a field to yourself is to put on a show that a prospective competitor either could not equal, or at least improve upon, and not wait to do this until the dividing of patronage makes it impossible.

He Breaks In.

A. M. Malley, Empress theater, Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, writes:

At last I have decided to break into the circle with a question. If the current comes over the positive wire, and, after crossing the arc, leaves by the negative, the top carbon being positive and the lower negative, what is the explanation of the following? At our other house they have a focused image of the carbons on the walls of the operating room, and the image appears reversed, with a bluish flame, which spreads, or seems to spread from the end of the lower carbon, and strikes the crater on the upper carbon, where it covers a considerable area. This seems to be contradictory of the accepted idea of the way electricity travels, i. e., from positive to negative. Can you furnish any enlightenment on this point. Under separate cover I am sending you photograph of the Empress theater operating room. The size of the room is 11 feet by 10 feet 6 inches, with a [illegible] foot 6 inch ceiling. We use d. c. taken through a 7 k. w. motor generator, with a. c. auxiliary for emergency. The machines are two Powers Six A. We have a good size work bench. The size of the picture is 16 feet, with a 95-foot throw. Operators A. M. Malley and J. P. Fowler. The Empress is a beautiful theater, seating 800. It boasts what is a rarity in these parts, viz.: a pipe organ. In closing I wish all kinds of success to the projection department.

With regard to your question, my brother, nobody knows exactly what does take place, and for your benefit let me say that some eminent electricians claim that nothing at all passes along or through the wires in either direction, but that electric current is simply a "state," or that it is a "molecular bombardment." You are at liberty to make as much as you can out of that, Friend Malley. Other equally eminent electricians claim that an intangible something actually passes along or over the wires, and I may say that the editor belongs to this latter breed. Among the holders of the latter view the universal opinion has been that the action is from positive to negative, but of late quite some few have changed their view in this respect, and now claim that the action is from negative to positive, which seems to me to spell plain common sense after examining the action of an arc lamp. But this is a discussion that is largely a waste of printer's ink, because even the Wizard of Orange himself does not know what takes place, how it takes place, or why it takes place. Nor does it matter. Troubling our brains about questions of this kind is like trying to find the North [illegible]ole. What good is the darned thing after it is "discovered?" and how are you going to prove you really have "discovered" it.

Stillwater Child Operators.

George C. Johnston, St. Paul, Minnesota, contributes the following:

I was recently in Stillwater, Minn., and visited several motion picture houses. Stillwater has a population of about 35,000; has one legitimate theater and three "movies." The first house I entered had a gold fibre screen and a 1911 motiograph. A Keystone two-reel picture was running, which I noted had a dark sepia tint. I went into the operating room and there found a mere child standing upon a cracker box and operating the machine. He informed me he had seen his thirteenth summer. The reason for the dark tint in the picture was apparent. The condensers were so dirty and brown that the light quality was ruined, and the arc was pulled back in the lamp house so far that there was nothing but a blur at the aperture. There was considerable travel ghost and I asked the operator (? ? ?) if he had ever set his shutter. He looked at the dowser a time or two, wiggled it, and replied that, so far as he knew no adjustment could be made. I gave it up for a bad job right then and there. At the next theater a youngster in knickerbockers was running a Powers equipment. This young genius had been playing checkers with the combinations in his projection lenses. "Tonight," said he, "my picture is better than it has been for months. What do you think of it?" I did not enlighten his budding mind in this respect, as I did not want to bust his feelings all to pieces. I am writing this, Brother Richardson, in the hope that you will lend your assistance in helping to wake up Stillwater theater managers. There are a number of good operators here in St. Paul who could be filling these jobs, and who are at present without employment. In the name of the art of projection please speak loudly and distinctly with regard to this sort of practice. And right here let me say that I think a great deal of Brother Preddey's mount, and I wish him all the success in the world. It has done royal service in my case, and I believe it will in the case of others.

Brother Johnston, I have spoken "loudly and distinctly" so many times with regard to this particular piece of idiocy that it seems almost puerile to repeat. However, I would suggest that if Stillwater has a population of 35,000, and the conditions are as named, it would be a mighty good scheme for some real live St. Paul manager to go over there, put on a show with real projection, and put the employers of babes out of business, and if what Friend Johnston says is true they ought, not only in the interest of the people of Stillwater but in the interest of the motion picture fraternity as a whole, to be put out of business. It seems almost incredible that in this advanced day when here in New York City moving picture theaters are being filled, night and matinee, seven days a week, at twenty-five, fifty cents and even one dollar a seat, managers still cling to the six-years-behind-the-times brand of projection, which makes a travesty and farce out of the most beautiful and magnificent productions. It would not be any earthly good to "roast" these "managers." If they have no more enterprise, or any higher conception of the possibilities of the business than to place the projection in their theaters (?) in charge of little boys, why there is only one remedy, and that is real competition. There are many men looking for good openings. In view of what has been set forth I would recommend that some of them investigate Stillwater. They would have the field to themselves if they put on real projection, for competition of the kind described amounts, to all intents and purposes, to nothing.

Best They Have Ever Done.

E. F. Breeze, president The Breeze Amusement Company, Flemingsburg, Kentucky, arises to make the following remarks:

> Enclosed find check for one of the Handbooks. We have the first edition and literally could not get along without it and the Moving Picture World. We have installed a 9 horse-power, 100 ampere, 60-volt Fairbank-Morse light plant, and we have found it to be the best thing we ever did since we first entered the business. Our current now costs us about $2 a week, whereas before it ran from $12 to $15. We use kerosene costing 8½ cents per gallon. We run from 7 to 9:30 P. M. every night, with a Saturday matinee. We get a dandy light at the arc, using ⅝ cored carbons, but do you think this is right? The condensers are 6½ and 7½. Our water tank is on the outside of the building. Do you think the water would freeze this winter? It is made of galvanized iron. The picture is 10½ feet with a 60 foot throw.

Well, I do not know how cold it gets down there, though if the tank is a small one it probably would freeze, though probably not solid, however, if the pipe runs up outside the building that certainly would freeze, and probably burst. Five-eighth carbons above is all right, but since your current is d. c. I would use ½-inch solid below, but if you prefer cored carbons below then use half inch or 7-16, preferably the latter, if you can get them. I think on the whole, however, you will find ⅝ cored above and half inch solid below will give the best results. Coming back to the tank matter, you had better use your own judgment there; you know your climate better than I do.

It is to Laugh.

A few days ago I dropped in to have a chat with Mr. Brown, chief examiner of the New York Board, and while there, the examinations being over for the day, myself, friend Brown and the other two examiners spent perhaps an hour in conversation, talking over various things in connection with examinations. In the course of that time I was shown the record of one of the examinations held that afternoon, it being the third time the man in question had been up for examination, he claiming that he had been operating in a suburban town for six months. He tried to gauge a No. 6 wire by using the holes in the gauge, and thus pronounced it a No. 9 with a capacity of 35 amperes. He was shown a piece of wire having no rubber in its insulation and said he would use it in the conduit. He said that an economizer consisted of four coils enclosed in a laminated case; that the rheostat did not affect the voltage; called an adjustable rheostat a fixed rheostat; said he could not use a rheostat on a. c. (at a former examination had replied that if a rheostat was connected to a. c. "it would blow up"); was shown a link fuse and told to place it in position. Placed the fuse across from the binding post on one side to the binding post on the other side, thus forming a short circuit. He called the revolving outside shutter of a Powers Six the "fly wheel," and that was the only part of the machine he could name. And yet this man has been up three times for examination and claimed to have been operating for six months. It is to laugh.

The Meniscus-Bi-Convex Matter.

On page 703, August 1st issue, I gave my recommendation to the meniscus-bi-convex condenser lens proposition, and said that I believed that it was very much superior to the plano-convex. Since that time I have been a little nervous, because one or two have written discouragingly after using the meniscus-bi-convex, and a large optical house, in whose judgment I have great confidence, wrote saying they did not believe there was any appreciable advantage in the use of these lenses.

Now this is an exceedingly important matter, and while I by no means feel pleased to be compelled to set my judgment up against the house in question, still I am obliged to do so, at least to the extent of saying that I believe in this instance I am nearer right than they are. So important is this mattter that I am going to quote a couple of letters just received, in full, or practically in full.

C. J. Shonka, proprietor New Hopkins Theatre, Hopkins, Minn., writes, under date of September 19th.: "There seems to be a diversity of opinion as to the merits of the meniscus-bi-convex condensing lens proposition, and the discussion furnishes food for speculation as to the real merits of these lenses. As proprietor of the Hopkins Theatre, and likewise an operator with six years of experience, who has also paid the penalty of unnumbered broken condensers, I feel fully justified in saying this much: two years ago last January my atttention was called to the new combination of condensing lenses which was just being brought into the market. I was induced to make a trial of these lenses, using a 7½ meniscus and an 8½ bi-convex, projecting a 16-foot picture at 110 feet. The result was a revelation, and frankly I was amazed. I had been using 40 amperes, but have since reduced to 32, and the most surprising part is that the pair of condensing lenses I purchased two years ago last January is still in commission, after being subjected to all manner of heat, cold and draughts, and, moreover they have remained perfect, with the exception of a slight discoloration in the nature of a light straw color. I, myself, am thoroughly satisfied that if exhibitors or operators who are interested in bettering their light would exercise care and ingenuity, and use mechanical judgment in adjusting the condensing lenses in the mount they would soon learn just what to do to get the beautiful clear white light I have."

Also under date of September 19th, John Guthrie, manager Majestic Theatre, Grove City, Pa., writes: "In current issue of the department I notice an adverse criticism on the meniscus-bi-convex condensing lenses and am moved thereby to write you of an experiment I made with a pair of these lenses. Lately I installed a pair of them in one of my machines, and thought I saw some improvement in the brilliancy of the picture as against that of the other machine, but I was not sure how much this amounted to, as I found it very hard to compare on account of not being able to see the same film projected by both machines, side by side, at one and the same time. I used two Powers projectors of the same type, equipped with a pair of Gundlach projection lenses which are identical. Both lamps take current from the same generator, through rheostats which are exactly alike, or, at least, supposed to be so, and which have been in service the same length of time, and while I did not use an ammeter on this test I feel safe in saying that both lamps received the same amount of current. To determine the mattter of brilliancy I masked the right half of the aperture plate on one machine and the left half on the other, using a piece of tin for the purpose, and made sure that each machine was illuminating just half the curtain. I could then see quite a difference in the light on the curtain, and the difference was in favor of the meniscus lenses, and this was so marked that I have since made the experiment once or twice, going over everything carefully to be sure that the meniscus lens machine did not have better conditions in some way than the other. Just how much the difference amounts to I could not say definitely, but both my operator and myself agreed that it looked to be at least 20 or 25 per cent, and the plano lenses in the other machine were not the old-fashioned, cheap, dirty kind, but a couple of good lenses. From these experiments, and from watching the pictures, I feel perfectly safe in saying that better results are to be obtained by the use of meniscus-bi-convex lenses, and the only adverse comment I would have to make would be that the pair I have had in use the longest time show a slight discoloration, or, in other words, a very slight straw tint, but I do not believe this is enough to seriously injure results, and I am sure they had a severe test in my machine, if heat and strong light have anything to do with it. I would very much like to hear of other operators who have two machines in their rooms making this test and the results."

In addition to the foregoing the Laemmle Film Service of Minneapolis has forwarded me some original letters, portions of which I shall quote, since they are not copies but letters written on the letter heads of the parties named and signed by them.

R. Helbach & Son, proprietors of the Theatorium, Ardmore, Okla., under date of September 15th, writes to the Laemmle Film Service, saying: "Enclosed find check for $6.60 for some more condensers. We don't see how we ever got along without them. We only purchased a pair to try them out and were so much surprised at the good results that we would not be without them now for anything."

W. G. Woods, general sales agent, with John H. Elbert, San Francisco, California, in whose judgment I have more confidence than in any other one operator in the country, bar none, under date of September 19th, writes as follows: "The meniscus-bi-convex condensers received from you some time ago have been given a thorough try out at one of the best houses in this city, and we (Mr. Woods writes as general sales agent of John D. Elbert, Ed.) take the liberty of saying they are all to the good. Tried in comparison with the average commercial condensers selling from fifty cents to a dollar, they show a wonderful advantage as to the quality of the picture as well as the quantity of light. When tried against the highest grade of B. & L. they still show improvement, inasmuch as the spot seems to be whiter to the edges, thus enabling a smaller spot to be carried, and, therefore the utilization of more of the light. We have demonstrated these lenses before the union here and the comment has been favorable." Mr. Woods then goes on to say that they, John D. Elbert, cannot handle the lenses in San Francisco, as they have never handled any general supplies, except specialties made by them, but that both Mr. Elbert and himself will do all they can at any time to further the interest of this or any other thing which will be of benefit to projection.

It will be noted, in this connection, that Mr. Woods remarks upon the improved quality of the picture, meaning, of course, the improvement in sharpness or definition, and this is what I have contended all along, viz., that the advantage of these lenses lies fully as much in the reduction of spherical aberration, and possibly to some extent, chromatic aberration as well, as in the improvement of the light itself. This matter is not settled, and I believe, moreover, that the dealers in these lenses ought, by all means, to immediately proceed to very carefully, by means of experiments, or otherwise, determine exactly what combination of these lenses are best suited to use with the various objectives, and in this connection I would respectfully suggest that they call into consultation W. S. James, Camden, N. J.; L. C. La Grow, 3 Park Avenue, Idlewild, Watervleit, N. Y., and John Griffiths, Pastime Theatre, Ansonia, Conn., or, at least, one of them. I would also very much like to hear the results of experiments such as was suggested by Friend Guthrie, of Grove City. But the operator who is using these lenses should carefully experiment and find the proper distance their lenses should be apart, and the proper distance of the condensers from the film. We have a lot to learn about this meniscus-bi-convex combination, but I am more and more becoming convinced that it is the thing. The only doubt I have enters by reason of the optical difficulties encountered in the use of the meniscus lens, in which curvature of the convex side must be enough greater to make up for the convex. It is barely possible that the plano-convex-bi-convex combination might be better than the meniscus; this also ought to be experimented with.

Small Town Circuit.

J. A. Landgren, Aurora, Colorado, orders a Handbook and asks my opinion of the following:

> Another party and myself, neither one of us versed in the art of projection, have been investigating the matter of buying an Animatograph projection machine, and after both of us studying your Handbook and operating a machine for a time, to start out on the road, playing small towns having electric current, intending to put up a good show. Our ultimate intention will be to either get a permanent location, or, make a circuit of three to six small towns playing each one or twice a week. What do you think of the idea, and can you recommend the machine named for the purpose?

I cannot recommend either the scheme or the machine, that is to say, I cannot recommend the Animatograph for regular theatrical work, since it is not designed for that kind of service. This thing of "playing small towns" looks mighty alluring and feasible, but let me tell you that unless you are an experienced showman you are more than likely to get your fingers scorched, and scorched pretty badly, too. The stumbling block in this proposition is the expense account. A few experienced showmen have succeeded on this kind of proposition, but the dollars they have grubbed out of it have been mighty well earned. I do not know of anything you could take up that would require more good, hard work, both mental and physical, for each dollar received than the stunt you name. Please understand me that I don't say you would fail, but I do say that the chances are four to one against your success, and even if you succeed you will not buy any gasoline launches or benzine buggies on the surplus accumulated. You wanted my opinion and you have it. If it is not pleasant to the taste, that, my dear Mr. Landgren, is not my fault. I am merely telling you cold facts, as you will discover if you follow the scheme out.

Standard Machine Parts Obtainable.

For the benefit of users of American Standard Machines: The American Standard Motion Picture Machine Company has been re-organized, with M. D. Kopple as president. The office of the company is now at 110 West 40th Street, New York City, where repair parts for American Standard machines may be obtained. Later the company will, no doubt, make proper announcement of its future plans in the department. This information will be quite a relief to users of Standard machines.

What He Must Know.

Champaign, Illinois, says:

> In one of your comments, August 11th, you mention the fact that in order to join the I. A. T. S. E. one must be an operator. Please mention requirements of examination, number of questions, subjects, etc. What make of eye glasses can be obtained to shield the eyes from the bright spot while operating?

You would have to satisfy the examining committee of the union that you are a practical, competent operator. I could not tell you what questions they would ask, nor the subjects they would cover, but you would have to be well posted on electrical action, that much is sure. There are several makes of eye glasses on the market designed for purposes of this kind, but I do not remember the names or addresses of the manufacturers. Many operators fix a piece of bottle greeen glass (a light shade of green) in a little frame atttached to the gate of the machine, so that it comes on the right hand side of the spot, and thus protects the eyes of the operator. It is, I think, a most excellent plan. But don't get too dark a shade of green. If you cannot purchase the same I will get you a piece and forward the same for 50 cents, half of which sum would be for tne glass itself, and the rest for the trouble of sending a messenger for it. The address of the Pittsburg Local is, Joseph Dean, 1419 Pennsylvania ave., and the Chicago Local is Hal Johnston, 403 Dexter Bldg.

New Film Printer.

The Duplex Company, located at 316 75th Street, Brooklyn, New York, have placed on the market a Duplex Step Film Printer. The writer has examined this machine and it has been a pleasure to look at an article which is so mechanically excellent. To begin with, the basic idea of the Duplex Printer is to save labor by enabling one attendant to print two positives at one and the same time. As will be seen by the illustration, the Duplex is, in effect, two printers in one frame, the aperture plates being located less than six inches apart. This machine contains many unique, and, it seems to me, many valuable features, not the least of which is the adjustable shutter lever BB, which moves up and down on a graduated quadrant having ten notches. The shutter of the printer which revolves between the lamp and the aperture plate has one light opening, but this opening is adjustable, the minimum being approximately one-quarter of an inch, and the maximum one-half the shutter, or, in other words, the maximum opening is 50%. When either of levers AA are moved upwards the light is diminished, since the moving of the lever in that direction operates to diminish the shutter opening. The change may be made and the light adjusted to any desired value while the machine is in motion. The light may be automatically reduced or increased by means of a perforated card placed in one of the two receptacles A-A for instance: If scene No. 1 of the film required a certain light value the first space of the card is punched at a given spot, and if scene No. 2 requires a different light value the next card space is punched accordingly, and so on for a possible twenty-one scenes. The card thus prepared is then placed in receptacle provided and as the film is run the light is changed automatically to match the density of the film. These cards are permanent and are filed away alphabetically for future prints. Another valuable feature of the machine lies in the tension. During the time the films move down over the aperture there is no tension at all, the same being automatically and entirely released. This not only obviates any possibilities of stretching the film, but also removes the possibilities of generating static, which is the mortal enemy of the film printer, as well as the cameraman. The machine is driven by motor, the same being housed in the frame below the mechanism. The printer throughout is a substantial piece of machinery, and is built with mechanical precision which, it seems to me, ought to procure high class results.

The Duplex Machine Company informs me they are after quality instead of quantity, and this is precisely what the moving picture industry today stands in need of.

There are many other features included in this printer, all of which are excellent. The familiar claw-type intermittent, known to operators as the "finger feed," is built very heavily for such a piece of mechanism. The machine is guaranteed against every possible fault for one year, and will, I think, give thoroughly satisfactory service. Its installation requires but the insertion of an electric socket. It may be placed in any part of a dark room, and requires but twenty-six inches of floor space.

I am glad to be justified in saying these kind things about this machine. I am compelled to do so much criticising that it is a relief to be able to praise. The Duplex machine is not cheap, but it looks mighty good to me.

THE LETTER THAT NEVER CAME OUT (Edison), Oct. 13.—A picture drama written by W. T. Nichols. Jealousy is the theme of the plot, on the part of a woman who has a husband, whom she married for spite, and through which act she causes a great deal of trouble for herself and friends. There is very little interest for the casual observer in this offering, although it is well directed and acted. The redeeming qualities shown in this visualization come in the last scenes. It will please in most respects.

PERCY PIMPERNICKEL—SOUBRETTE (Kalem), Oct. 13.—A John E. Brennan farce, written by E. R. Coffin and directed by Albert W. Hale. The plot is laid in the year 1950, when woman rules the universe. The idea is original and produces many laughs, from the fact that the sexes are reversed. Otherwise this comedy would be a very tame one, but as it is presented it is a very laughable number.

THROUGH EYES OF LOVE (Essanay), Oct. 13.—This is a reversal in plot and theme. Usually the country girl flees or elopes to the city, but in this offering the city girl flees to the country, to escape leading a society life. There are many pleasant episodes prevailing, and taken all in all it is very satisfying. J. A. Roach is the author and Richard C. Travers directs and plays the leading part. Beverly Bayne and Rapley Holmes are the other principals. Can recommend this offering.

THE MEXICAN (Selig), Oct. 13.—A western drama in which Tom Mix plays the title role and also directs. It is written by Lynn F. Reynolds. A noble act in this picture might be termed a courageous revenge. A little child, almost a baby, cleverly played by Lillian Wade, is one of the leading characters. There is much that is intensely interesting in the development of the picture, and it is all well done. A happy ending is the result of the Mexican's efforts.

SWAMI SAM (Lubin), Oct. 13.—A farcical comedy picture by E. W. Sargent, produced by J. A. Murphy, which involves a rube police force, a fake fortune teller and a colored laundress, many lively complications occur, which are greeted with hilarious laughter. On the same reel with "Neighborly Neighbors."

NEIGHBORLY NEIGHBORS (Lubin), Oct. 13.—On the same reel with "Swami Sam." Many laughable scenes are engrafted in this farce, which while improbable might be possible. The characters are all well rendered. After many tribulations there is a jolly ending.

ANDY AND THE REDSKINS (Edison), Oct. 14.—The eleventh in the adventure of Andy, by Mark Swan. This is of about the same calibre as the previous productions of this series, the redeeming feature of which is some fair scenes in a wild west show, with the Indians dressed in chocolate colored tights (an innovation). This release is evidently produced to make children laugh.

THE FABLE OF THE AUTHOR AND THE DEAR PUBLIC AND THE PLATE OF MUSH (Essanay), Oct. 14.—Credit is due to George Ade for producing another laugh maker, this time involving a would-be author, who realizes that popularity is only "skin deep" and not what it is cracked up to be. Lester Cuneo and Harry Dunkinson combine to demonstrate the comedy. The author's reputation finally drives him to the woods. This is a great laugh producer.

THE MYSTERIOUS BEAUTY (Selig), Oct. 14.—One of Will M. Hough's farce-comedies. This is rather more of an amusing and interesting nature than a boisterous laugh producer. It contains more pretentious scenes than the usual farce-comedy and the acting of William Scott, Elsie Greeson and John Lancaster is well done. It is a good illustration of the old saw, "Love is Blind."

THE PEACEMAKER (Vitagraph), Oct. 14.—A comedy picture which does not contain a great deal of forcefulness, but which, nevertheless, is very interesting, from the fact that it is well played in a natural sort of a way by Van Dyke Brooke, "The Peacemaker," Antonio Moreno, Norma Talmadge, Garry McGarry and Constance Talmadge. There is much beautiful garden scenery shown which has been splendidly photographed. This is a fine, pleasing release.

THE FIRST LAW (Biograph), Oct. 15.—A picture drama with the scenes, for the most part, located in the woods, and the characters, with one or two exceptions, involved, are the inhabitants thereof. There is much good photography in evidence. The love element is fairly convincing and there are one or two intense scenes. The actors do full justice to their parts.

SNAKEVILLE'S PEACEMAKER (Essanay), Oct. 15.—A Slippery Slim comedy, written and produced by G. M. Anderson. Although this is a rough western picture it contains many laughs from the way Mustang Pete puts it over on Slim, and the way Slim tries to get square. Absurdities are involved in the plot, but the general action throughout gains many laughs. A bevy of pretty girls cut a figure. It is liked by the audience.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NEWS, NO. 66 (Selig), Oct. 15.—Very interesting topical happenings are shown in this educational, as follows: The duties of boys on the school ship Newport; foreign war scenes; Paris turned into a grazing ground for animals to be slaughtered for fresh meat; battlefield of Senlis after the fighting has ceased; French engineers on their way to Compaigne with truck loads of pontoons, bridge materials, also provision and supply wagons; wounded from Compaigne and crippled cavalry horses on the way to rear; season's fads and fashions; "Safety First" teachers meeting at Chicago, also R. C. Richards, the propagator of same; train orders are shown of many lines bearing the "Safety First" labels, which have been adopted; also interiors of machine shops, with safety signs posted in conspicuous places; even children are taught to say "Good-bye, Papa, 'Safety First.'"

HIS DOMINANT PASSION (Vitagraph), Oct. 15.—There are many things in this picturepiay that are subject to an open question as to whether they should be placed on the screen, but perhaps a moral is to be conveyed; this we leave to the spectators to draw their own conclusions. J. O. Curwood is the author and William Humphrey, Leah Baird and J. H. Frank have the leading parts. There is a rather thrilling fire scene. The convincing quality seems lacking in this release.

PEG O' THE WILD-WOOD (Biograph), Oct. 16.—A photo drama wherein the scenes are located, as the caption would suggest—that is, the majority of them, in the woods. There is intensity in the situations and the characters are indigenous to the environment. Irene Howley, Vivian Prescott, L. Hart, Jos. McDermott and Ivan Chrystie give good renditions in their various roles. The photography is excellent. An interesting release.

SI'S WONDERFUL MINERAL SPRING (Kalem), Oct. 16.—A comedy visualization, written and directed by Marshal Neilan, in which Ruth Roland and Lloyd V. Hamilton are featured. The situations and complications are quite laughable. F. Fralick deserves mention for his portrayal of a rube. The exterior photography is exceptional. A good comedy release.

THE LONG LANE (Lubin), Oct. 16.—A picture drama by Will M. Ritchey and produced by Paul Powell. The story is laid in a mountain district. The plot involves the characters in scenes of love, jealousy, treachery and attempted murder. The development of the plot crowds closely on the old story of "Enoch Arden," but deviates into a different ending. While it is adequately acted there is a lack of convincing quality pertaining, however, it is up to the ordinary offering.

THE MAN-HATER (Selig), Oct. 16.—A farce comedy by James Oliver Curwood. This comedy is a sort of compromise between the legitimate and the rough and tumble brand. It is filled with absurd complications and impossibilities, but it fulfils the requirements for which it is written and receives from the audience hilarious laughter.

FATTY'S SWEETHEART (Vitagraph), Oct. 16.—This is a Ralph Ince comedy, produced by himself and in which he plays a prominent part. Hughie Mack plays Fatty the lover, and his sweetheart is Lucille Lee. There are real laughable situations in spots, but much of the comedy is forced and fails to hit the mark properly. There is a flavor of burlesque melodrama pertaining, which assist Fatty, who after enduring many indignities, to win out.

THE CASE OF THE VANISHED BONDS (Edison), Oct. 17.—Adapted from "Below the Dead Line," by Scott Campbell. A rather interesting story in detail in which detectives take the prominent parts and, by the way, there is not a female in the cast. The whole story concentrates on the recovery of some lost bonds. Some good scenes are shown in a building under construction. Not a very forceful offering, but is well acted.

MEETING MR. JONES (Biograph), Oct. 17.—What otherwise might have been constructed, out of the same material a good comedy is ruined by absurdities and horseplay, in this production. It is on the same reel with "Our Home-made Army."

OUR HOME-MADE ARMY (Biograph), Oct. 17.—On the same reel with "Meeting Mr. Jones." In this farcical offering an absurd attempt is made to burlesque a military drama. Outrageous costuming, make-up and overacting ruins the desired effect.

BRONCHO BILLY REWARDED (Essanay), Oct. 17.—Broncho Billy exhibits himself in a much different sort of a character in this picture, than he has heretofore assumed; that of a good-for-nothing saloon hanger-on and porter. By a clever ruse he captures a desperate bandit, who has cleaned out the town, thus winning $500 reward, besides outdoing the sheriff and his posse. A very good release.

FROM PERIL TO PERIL (Kalem), Oct. 17.—A picture drama featuring Helen Holmes, ably supported by Charles Wells and a good cast. There are a great many thrilling scenes in which Miss Holmes does some strenuous work, climaxing the whole by making a perilous leap from a jack-knife bridge, in pursuit of two burglars. There is exceptional photography in this offering and it can be classed as a thriller.

THE SMUGGLER'S DAUGHTER (Lubin), Oct. 17.—A boisterous burlesque on a marine melodrama, written by E. W. Sargent, and directed by J. T. Hevener. This picture is quite humorous in conception and besides contains all the serious elements of a melodrama—produced in a burlesque manner. The valuable import that is being smuggled is "Limburger cheese." There is much strenuous work done by the actors, and great care has been taken in the selections of the scenes to bring out the points.

THE WOMAN OF IT (Selig), Oct. 17.—A psychological picture drama written by Colin Campbell, in which is visualized a vision of the primitive. This is an unusual picture. A woman, her sweetheart and a rough boatman are together on the seashore, she falls asleep and dreams, the remaining scenes of the film portray them as shipwrecked on a desert island, where they drift back, in time, to the primitive. The scenes are beautifully photographed. There is splendid acting by Kathlyn Williams, Wheeler Oakman and Chas. Clary.

HIS WEDDED WIFE (Vitagraph), Oct. 19.—An out-of-the-rut picture play, written by E. R. Carpenter, that has been made by William Humphrey. While there is much improbability engrafted in this visualization, it is, nevertheless, interesting and has been well worked up by the director. The happenings are so uncommon that they create a great amount of conjecture as to the ultimate termination. Leah Baird does excellent work in the leading role, and is ably supported by a star cast. This release is exceptional for a one-reeler.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, No. 67 (Selig), Oct. 19.—Topical scenes are shown as follows: Suffragettes in autos, starting on campaign tour; Fire Prevention Day parade in Chicago, on the anniversary of Chicago fire; scenes at the World's champion baseball series—immense crowds outside gates of Shibe Park—scenes of the critical plays on the diamond—portraits of players and managers; Edison's first visit to the navy—on board the New York, also on submarine C-4; exhibits by society belles of chic cotton gowns, in the interest of "Buy a Bale of Cotton," etc.

HESANUT BUYS AN AUTO (Kalem), Oct. 19.—An animated comedy cartoon. On the same reel with "The Mad Mountaineer." It is about as funny as its predecessors.

SHE LANDED A BIG ONE (Essanay), Oct. 19.—Many of the "Sweedie" comedies, in the past, have been meritorious and created in the aggregate a great amount of laughter, but this one seems to have struck the toboggan as a laugh producer, as far as reasonableness is concerned.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE SMUGGLED DIAMONDS (Edison), Oct. 19.—This is the tenth of the "Octavius Amateur Detective Series," picturized from a story in the Pictorial Review. It contains many scenes on board ship and also in the Custom House, on this side of the water. Octavius, as usual, wins out by accident. It is all very plausible and takes well with the audience.

A SOLDIER BOY (Biograph), Oct. 19.—A very pretty domestic picture, which opens in a small city, many of the scenes taking place in the home of a widow and her son, who upon the declaration of war enlists to serve his country. There are many affecting scenes between the mother, his sweetheart and himself. There is more of emotion than strength in this offering. It is splendidly acted by Chas. West, Mr. Butler, Claire McDowell and Kate Bruce in the leading roles.

THE IRON MASTER (Biograph), Oct. 13.—A two-reel production picturized from the famous drama by Georges Ohnet, in which is depicted the contrast between the aristocrat and the tradesman; a chasm which is emphasized in this picture. It entails a marriage between the two extremes, and later developments reveal to the wife the true nobleness of her husband, though he be a bourgeois. George Morgan, in the title role, is efficient, and Viola Smith, Louise Vale, Wm. Jefferson, Franklin Ritchie and Vivian Prescott impress in their various characters. This is a most worthy presentation.

MAREEA, THE FOSTER MOTHER (Vitagraph), Oct. 13.—A two-part picture play. The theme of his plot is somewhat paradoxical and wholesomeness has not been considered as a leading feature, by the author and producer. As Mareea, a half-breed, Anne Schaefer deserves the highest praise for her strong emotional work. There are many intense scenes, especially one in a disreputable dance hall in the dock district. Self-sacrifice and devotion are shown in a vivid contrast with selfishness and ingratitude in this picture. Finely produced and it contains a moral.

SEED AND THE HARVEST (Kalem), Oct. 14.—A two-act modern picture drama, which is portrayed by a strong cast, including Alice Hollister, Robert Walker, Harry Millarde and Helen Lindroth. There occurs a series of incidents in this offering which are very convincing and good for parents to see. The acting, with one or two exceptions, is well done and the photography is of a good quality. Raymond C. Hill is the author and Robert G. Vignola the director.

THE BOND OF WOMANHOOD (Lubin), Oct. 14.—This two-part picture drama has been well written and contains many scenes which appeal to the spectators sympathetically, and demonstrates how good women can be made to suffer through selfish and intemperate husbands. The author, Shannon Fife, has produced a visualization of extremes, which Joseph Smiley has presented with telling action, in appropriate backgrounds. Justina Huff, an aristocrat, and Lilie Leslie, a rough fisher-woman, do justice to the diversified roles as the suffering wives, and the other characters are splendidly handled. A picture that will grace any program.

THE IMPOSTER (Lubin), Oct. 15.—A two-act picture play written by Emmet Campbell Hall and directed by L. B. Carleton. A finely acted production, which contains many beautiful exterior and artistically arranged interior scenes. There is little in this picture to criticise as regards direction, acting and photography. Suspense is created by a clever trick turned in the last scene, which is more than usually commendable.

ON THE ISLE OF SARNE (Edison), Oct. 16.—This two-part picture play has been reviewed at length, by Louis Reeves Harrison, in the Moving Picture World, and can be found on page 1753, issue of Sept. 26, 1914.

THE OTHER MAN (Essanay), Oct. 16.—A two-part photoplay written by Maibelle Heikes Justice. While the plot of this pictured story contains much intensity, the theme embodies the same idea as those inculcated in the modern problem plays and includes in its cast the "everlasting triangle" not a very wholesome one. The redeeming feature is the faithfulness displayed by the old butler, rendered by Mr. Thomas Commerford, who, with the assistance of a little child, saves the mother from disgracing herself and ruining the future life of her baby. Fairly interesting, with an ending of anguish, that leaves in the mind of the spectator a feeling of pity for human weaknesses.

THE GIRL IN THE CASE (Vitagraph), Oct. 17.—A special feature photoplay in two parts, written by William B. Courtney and produced by Robert Gailord and Maurice Costello, both of whom have leading roles. A number of happenings in this release are possible in a picture, only, and several inconsistencies are perceptible. While the acting and photography are exceptional, there is a lack of conviction pertaining, evidently, through inadvertence. Estelle Madro, as the stenographer, displays sincerity in her work.

THE BLUE FLAME (Selig), Oct. 19.—A two-reel melodramatic picture. The story of this plot concerns the loss by theft of a fortune in diamonds. The first section of the picture illustrates how a gang of crooks systemize a plot to obtain them, and the second reel shows how a detective and his assistants foil and bring the gang to justice. It is a strong, thrilling release, finely acted and photographed.

THE MAD MOUNTAINEER (Kalem), Oct. 19.—A two-act drama featuring Irene Boyle and Tom Moore, who also directs the picture. This plot has been used before in other pictures but in a different manner. There is the usual theme of love. The photography is worthy of mention, and the acting is also adequate. Some thrilling and intense scenes occur which hold the interest.

Independent

THE HIGH SPOTS ON BROADWAY (Keystone), Oct. 15.—A farmer and his wife come to a city hotel. The man strikes up a flirtation and his wife goes on a rampage. The humor is rough and not very successful in most of the scenes; though it will bring a few laughs. The final scenes occur on a passenger bus.

THE WAY OF LIFE (Nestor), Oct. 16.—A crook story with Eddie Lyons, Victoria Forde, Stella Adams and others in the cast. The company usually plays comedy, but in this dramatic number they carry off honors of a different sort. Good photography helps this well-constructed story. The close is effective. A good release.

BACK TO THE KITCHEN (Majestic), Oct. 16.—Ranch farce that is sure to make a reasonable amount of laughter. It has excellent farce characters who are not less funny because they have been in pictures before. Dorothy Gish plays the juvenile lead; but she is not of so much account as "Baldy" Belmont, the chef and foreign nobleman; and the best character in it is the cook who wants to get married and who sees to it that she has the minister at the end of the chase of the chef who is running away to escape her.

THE TOUCH OF A LITTLE HAND (Princess), Oct. 16.—A story of simple elements in which Riley Chamberlain gives a good impersonation of a pawnbroker. The little child appeals to him in behalf of the imprisoned clerk who accepted imitation jewels to help the family out. The photography is good and the release quite pleasing.

THE BLACK HAND (Royal), Oct. 17.—A story written by Edgar Allan Wolf, in which an unhappy family man employs the black hand organization to kill him at a certain signal. The situations are farcical and quite amusing toward the last when the numerous signals begin working. This is fairly strong.

LEFT IN THE TRAIN (Thanhouser), Oct. 18.—A photoplay from a short story by Evelyn Van Buren, which makes a simple, direct appeal. The twins find a baby left on the train accidentally by its mother and take it home. The child's mother turns out to be the cast-off daughter of the household. The reconciliation is effective and the whole offering pleasing.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, Series No. 40 (Reliance), Oct. 19.—Margaret and her aunt in this number inspect New York City from the Flatiron building roof. The girl also inspects new styles in gowns. The plot is advanced a trifle, Baby Lily's father showing up and the mystery of the missing heirloom disposed of. A number of average interest.

DAD AND THE GIRLS (Beauty), Oct. 20.—Business-office farce with much that is amusing in it. Dad's wife doesn't like pretty stenogs., and Dad doesn't want Son to marry one no matter how pretty she is. Son schemes and Dad, in a trap, has to give his consent. For Ma catches Dad flirting with a pretty girl and Son claims that she is his fiancee, so Dad has to acquiesce. It is a fair offering.

ENVIRONMENT (Majestic), Oct. 20.—A picture put on by William Christie Cabanne in which there is perhaps as vigorously directed a thief-chase as we remember seeing. It is a character study, too; but the chase, which begins when the ne'er-do-well who has helped to rob the village bank, repents and decides to put back the money, is the picture's big thing. He has to chase his one-time pal about the village and on to a running freight train. It is a good entertainer.

IN THE OPEN (American), Oct. 21.—Ill-treated Mexican gypsy girl is rescued from her brutal stepfather by American cowboy, who takes her to his mother's cabin. The villainous old man comes to the cabin while the cowboy is away and recaptures the girl. She sets fire to the covering of their wagon in order to attract attention of the cowboy whom she sees passing in the distance. The acting of the love story is not convincing at all times, but the picture has some very pretty scenes.

OUT OF THE DEPUTY'S HANDS (Reliance), Oct. 21.—A picture directed by Arthur Maclay with a story that is fresh enough to interest. Its climax is after an explosion in a mine, and at this point it has some blood streaked faces far from being "pretty." Such things as these are not carried to our senses with any pleasant-to-experience thrill as many real horrors are. In a work of art—perhaps on account of convention solely—they give a sense of disgust. The acting is worthy and the picture has many excellent scenes.

THE LOVE THIEF (Keystone), Oct. 22. Rivalry in a park over a girl leads to a general row. Chester Conklin steals some hot dogs from the traveling vender and brings the lady some flowers. The subsequent pictures include a chase over roof tops and a lot of rapid-fire action, some of which is quite amusing.

SECRET SERVICE SNITZ (Sterling), Oct. 22.—Ford Sterling here appears as sheriff in a moonshiners' district. He gets on trail of the gang and takes a ride in a barrel over some cliffs. This runs along in about the same style as former productions, none of the action being particularly new.

SUSPENDED SENTENCE (Powers), Oct. 23.—Quite a pleasing number of juvenile sort. Edna Maison and Joe King appear as the parents of a bad little boy. He is scolded and sent to bed for his mischief. Later the mother dreams she and her husband are arrested and tried before their son as a judge. The children's court of justice was interesting and the production as a whole is amusing.

THE FINAL IMPULSE (American), Oct. 23.—Taken among the scenes of some big mining operation, it tells the story of a man whose impulses are very bad; but who finally gives his life to stop some destructive work that he himself has just started. The story lacks punch, perhaps mostly because it is not absolutely clear. Did the sight of the child change him? Were the men who were running to arrest him for shooting the woman he had wronged in danger from the car he sent back along the track they were following? He dies to stop this car, but some may not even see that clearly.

STOUT HEART BUT WEAK KNEES (Keystone), Oct. 24.—This runs along rather quietly for the first half reel and then pulls a number of surprising happenings, such as a bed falling through the floor into the room below. The latter part is quite laughable and makes good eccentric comedy.

SNOOKEE'S DAY OFF (Sterling), Oct. 26.—This number deals with a married man who does some snooping around bath houses on a beach. The scenes are vulgar and suggestive and the number has little to commend in it except the good photography.

SHOT IN THE EXCITEMENT (Keystone), Oct. 26.—Eccentric rube characters appear in this diverting number. The humor is all of the slapstick sort, varied by amusing tricks and antics. The photography is good and the close especially amusing for this type of film.

THE WALL OF FLAME (Nestor), Oct. 27.—A story of the forest ranger service. The discharged ranger pays unwelcome attentions to another man's wife. They have a hand-to-hand fight and the disgruntled fellow sets fire to woods near the cabin while there is a general forest fire raging. The woman is rescued with difficulty. Murdock MacQuarrie and Agnes Vernon are in the cast. The forest fire is a genuine one and furnishes the background for a good story.

THE PERSISTENT LOVERS (Crystal), Oct. 27.—An eccentric comedy number dealing with Mr. Opp's peculiar inheritance. Most of the scenes are taken at Coney Island, and the chief interest is in watching the witching waves, loop the loop and other resort concessions in operation. The story itself is not very strong.

MR. NOAD'S ADLESS DAY (Joker), Oct. 28.—This is an enjoyable comedy number with a new idea in it. What would happen if nobody advertised anything for sale? The picture shows how it affected Mr. Noad when the devil appeared before him and granted his wish to stop publicity. An original idea, nicely handled.

WHITE ROSES (Rex), Oct. 29.—An allegorical type of story, in which Ella Hall plays an innocent young girl, pursued by a young man with evil intentions. Harry Carter appears as Evil Thought, dressed as Satan. Double exposure photography is used, as he is invisible to the other characters. The white roses brought by the boy after the death of his sweetheart's sister, signified the awakening of conscience. A thoughtful, well-pictured production, with a touch of pathos in it.

WHEN BESS GOT IN WRONG (Nestor), Oct. 30.—Bess Merredyth, Lee Moran and Stella Adams are the principals in this amusing comedy offering. The young man tires of his sweetheart's flirtations with others and arranges with his friends to let her go home alone. There is just enough human nature in this to make it more than ordinarily amusing. The photography is good and the production a pleasing one for light comedy of the best type.

THE BLACKSMITH'S DAUGHTER (Frontier), Oct. 31.—A western number in which the hero gets up a little flirtation with the blacksmith's daughter by pretending to be sick. Later his discomfited rivals hold him up, but the girl comes to the rescue. The photography is only fair in this and it is of only about average merit.

PARTNERS IN CRIME (L—K. O.), Nov. 1.—An eccentric offering with Billy Ritchie playing the light-fingered tramp. There is considerable jumping, running and shooting in this, but the humor does not come up very strongly except in occasional places.

THE STRIKE AT COALDALE (Eclair), Nov. 1.—A strike story with Stanley Walpole and Mildred Bright as the girl. When the striker's refuse to take the president's daughter to the hospital on a special the hero boards an engine and conveys her there. He wins the demands of the men, the girl's hand and a promotion. This is well-photographed and moves along in a brisk, entertaining manner. It makes a good offering.

A TASTE OF HIGH LIFE (Warner's), October.—Farce, with the well-known Irish laborer who becomes a millionaire by the mistake of an attorney and then has to give up his high life. It was made and acted for the laughs rather than to amuse as a whole or convince. This story made really convincing would surely be a smashing success. There is some fair clown work in it and it is very likely to entertain and make the majority laugh.

THE MAD LOVERS (Warner's), October.—One of the Klark Komics. The lovers, Crashem and Smashem, are cowardly and dad doesn't approve of them as sons-in-law. They get up a fake fight to make themselves seem brave, and laughable doings result. It is acceptably acted and makes a very fair, even good, offering.

NOISY NEIGHBORS (Warner's), October.—A lively and exciting farce made by the "Starlight" studio. It has its vulgarities most of these farces with rough doings have—but it is very likely to prove a big laugh maker with the average audience.

REUBIN'S BUSY DAY (Warner's), October.—A quite amusing farce that is brisk and astonishing and has more than a touch of Keystone quality in it. It is sure to give acceptable entertainments and holds nothing objectionable. A good number to book. Reubin is a country constable and his patron, the village squire, is father of the picture's heroine, who wants to marry a man with an automobile. Neither Reubin or the father like this man. And so very funny doings are the outcome.

THE IMPOSTORS (Warner's), October.—One of those light farces which audiences will watch while it is on the screen, but won't be able to tell anything about it next day; because there is nothing very true or very funny in it. There are some good scenes. As a whole rather weak, but fair.

A MODERN SAMPSON (Warner's), October.—Rather clownish, jay-rube farce with country store constable and the like in it. This also seems to be rather cheaply written and acted. The man who, losing his election bet, can't shave till his party is again in power is the best thing in it.

THE VEGETARIANS (Warner's), October.—There is an old time (six years ago) flavor in this farce that, we feel sure, will not be counted as commendable by the majority of present day patrons. We have heard pictures of this kind called cheap; but we have also been in audiences where they passed very well indeed.

THE BANDIT OF DEVIL'S GAP (Warner's), October.—Made by the "St. Louis" studio, this wild west offering deals with circumstantial evidence in a very unconvincing way. The story has fair commercial value and doesn't drag. There are several interesting close-up views and some good acting in it. As a whole only fair.

NEARLY AN ARTIST (Warner's), October.—Comedy with a good situation that isn't very fresh. It has been written well; but the players, attempting to be clowning, often fail to make the laugh, which is all that clown work is for. Trying to be clowns they sometimes spoil the humanity of the story and the result at times make it seem cheap.

Independent Specials

THE REVENUE OFFICER'S DEPUTY (Reliance), Oct. 17.—A two-reeler, by F. A. Kelsey, bringing back in a fresh way an old acquaintance the man who grows brave when it comes to the scratch and he must win or lose the girl. It will surely interest; because the acting is natural and full of character and its exciting situations have been directed with vigor. Exhibitors will feel satisfied with this offering—it will go well.

FOR HER FATHER'S SINS (Majestic), Oct. 18.—A two-reel picture directed by John B. O'Brien and dealing with the hard lot of women working for small salaries. A big department store is the background of much of the action, and the story's heroine remains virtuous, but starves. The daughter of the store's owner gives her blood—a transfusion operation—to save the life of the poor girl, so suffering for the sins of her father. This makes the old man repent. There is a love story in it that is acceptable, but not wholly fresh. It is well acted. Billie West is the poor girl and Blanche Sweet the rich man's daughter. Wallace Reid is the poor girl's brother and Al Tilson the rich store proprietor.

DAYLIGHT (American), Oct. 19.—A two-reel number, written by Marc Edmund Jones, which runs in an entertaining and generally pleasing way. It is the story of a young musical genius whose eyesight is threatened by the strain of late hours. He goes to the country, where he meets the girl. Ed Coxen and Winifred Greenwood play the lovers and handle the parts in a consistent, appealing way. On his return to the city the hero's eyesight begins failing; he hastens back to the girl to see her once more before he completely loses his sight. The remainder of the story is equally good—his successful composition and subsequent fame, the disovery of glasses which restore his vision by an ultra ray, and then the final return of the couple to the hills. The photography is pleasing throughout.

OLD JACKSON'S GIRL (Thanhouser), Oct. 20.—A two-reel number, written by Philip Lonergan, with David Thompson and Mayre Hall in the cast. The story is an ordinary western one, the strongest features being the excellent photography, pleasing scenery and a good general atmosphere of the plains country. The hero is falsely accused of a crime committed by the girl's father. He and the girl take refuge in a cabin, which they defend from the pursuing cowboys. The girl dresses in male attire and leads the cowboys on a false chase. Later the hero is captured and she contrives to save him.

THE MYSTERIOUS HAND (Bison), Oct. 24.—Another three-reel number of the "My Lady Raffles" series, complete in itself. Grace Cunard and Francis Ford again demonstrate their ability to get up an atmosphere of mystery. They present a crook story which carries the observer from one improbable situation to another, yet it is all done in so entertaining a manner that it proves very pleasing. Grace Cunard appears in the first reel as a slavey. She saves the crooks from the detective and later joins the gang. Her subsequent activities are startling and enjoyable. Her escape from the detective was ingeniously presented. An entertaining combination of sensation and legerdemain, all well photographed.

DOUGH AND DYNAMITE (Keystone), Oct. 26.—Two reels of pure nonsense, some of which is very laughable indeed. Chas. Chaplin appears as a waiter in a French restaurant and bakery. He has a terrible time breaking dishes and getting the dough over the floor. The bakers go on a strike and at the last the whole place is blown up by dynamite. This is well-pictured and very successful for this form of humor.

THE LASS OF KILLKRANKIE (Victor), Oct. 26.—A Scotch story of a light comedy turn, featuring Elsie Albert as a lass with many lovers. The Scotch costumes furnish the principal atmosphere. The girl's father and mother each have favorite suitors for her hand, but she prefers Tammy, a country youth, who suddenly blossoms out as a soldier and wins over all rivals. The plot is engaging and contains a number of amusing incidents, but is not overly strong. It makes a pleasing change from the average run of comedies and is well photographed.

THE JAWS OF DEATH (Gold Seal), Oct. 27.—No. 13 of the "Trey o' Hearts" series. This is well pictured and contains some entertaining action. The first reel does not get up much excitement, but there is a strong melodramatic situation in the second, where Rose and her friends are locked in the chamber of the mine. Incoming water threatens to drown them, but an explosion occurs which releases the water, and the water in turn puts out the fire. The girl also has a narrow escape from death on the swinging suspension bridge which broke while she was crossing.

THE MYSTERY OF GRAYSON HALL (Eclair), Oct. 28.—A two-reel detective story. The crime itself is shown before the audience and consists of placing poison on the leaves of a book. The chief interest is in the work of the detective in rounding up the guilty nephew. He impersonates the murdered man a number of times, haunting him in a way that finally brings a confession of guilt. This is quite an unusual crime story, though it has no great suspense about it. Fred J. Hearn plays the double role of uncle and detective. Lindsley J. Hall gave a good account of himself as the guilty nephew. Though obvious, this has a strong psychological interest.

THE GOLDEN GOOSE (Broncho), Oct. 28.—A two-reel offering, by Ince and Clifford, which will undoubtedly have very general appeal. It introduces very pleasingly the golden goose of the fairy stories, this time a real goose colored by the heroine for the benefit of the little girl, Ruth. The heroine falls in love with the child's brother and later the gravel in the goose's crop leads him to discover a gold mine. He then saves her father's bank and they are happily married. A novel plot, with an interesting blend of fact and fancy. An unusually appealing story.

IN SELF-DEFENSE (Imp), Oct. 29.—A finely presented two-reel story is complicated by the interference of Tom during the hero's Henley, Wm. E. Shay and Violet Mersereau play the leads. The love story is complicated by the interference of Tom during the hero's absence. The girl's brother comes to her rescue, and during a struggle in the lake drowns Tom to save his own life. Hobart Henley did some particularly good acting in the part of the brother. The after scenes, when Billy returns and does some detective work on the case, are full of interest. The whole production is absorbing and well photographed. A good offering.

ERIC THE RED'S WOOING (Dominio), Oct. 29.—A two-reel story of the hardy Norsemen in which romance is given free swing and some unusual effects are achieved. The costuming is carefully looked after and the scenes along the rugged coasts suggest the northern fjords. Eric is a strapping Norseman who seizes the king's daughter, Hilma, and conveys her to his island retreat until the king restores him to favor. By this time the princess is in love with him and they are wed. This is new and different and full of interest.

THE WORTH OF A LIFE (Kaybee), Oct. 30.—A two-reel production by Ince and Sullivan, showing how the early influences on a medical graduate return later in life. The young doctor rises to the top of his profession and saves the husband of the woman he has always loved, in spite of her desire and his own that the man should die. Later he wins her anyway. This is splendidly photographed and particularly well acted. The plot is somewhat obvious, but has a new turn at the last. It makes altogether quite a strong offering.

THE WITCH GIRL (Victor), Oct. 30.—A two-reel number featuring Mary Fuller as a wild creature of the woods. There are some half-fairy touches in this story and this imaginative quality helps the interest very much. The girl lives with her brother and the old granny. She is discovered in the woods by a young doctor who takes her to his home with evil intentions. The girl escapes, but the doctor dreams of her and later goes and seeks her hand in marriage. This makes a good offering of the pretty, idyllic type and is pleasingly presented.

A REDSKIN RECKONING (Bison), Oct. 31.—A two-reel Indian story in which two braves are rivals for the hand of the chief's daughter. Some bandits rob a stage coach, kill the chief to get him out of the way, and thus precipitate trouble. The story itself is not much out of the ordinary and is, in fact, a trifle vague in places. The strongest feature of the production are the fine mountain backgrounds and other scenic views. These are well pictured and selected with an eye to natural beauty.

THE VAGABOND (Rex), Nov. 1.—A two-reel number, written by Ruth Ann Baldwin. Herbert Rawlinson plays the double role of a young man named Tom, who impetuously leaves home, and that of a youth named Chas. Ross. When Tom dies the latter takes his place and comes back to the waiting family. The general theme of this picture has been used very often before and this story does not get hold of the emotions very strongly. At the same time the cast is a good one and the photography and settings attractive. While only fairly convincing in certain scenes it tells a well-rounded story.

TERRISS NOT WITH GIBRALTAR CO.

Various rumors and reports have been circulated that Tom Terriss was to leave the World Film Corporation and make features for other interests. Those rumors have been set at rest and consigned to oblivion by the information borne in the following note from Mr. Terriss to the World Film Corporation:

"I would like to contradict the statement that has been issued of late in the various trade papers, etc., that I am allied with The Gibraltar Films, Inc. Will you please take notice of this and oblige."

B. A. Rolfe

Well-Known Vaudeville Magnate Joins Ranks of Motion Picture Producers and Will Release Through Alco.

AN optimistic and very earnest entrant into the moving picture ranks is the well-known vaudeville magnate, B. A. Rolfe, who signalized his entry into the new field by a filmed version of "Rip Van Winkle," in which Thomas Jefferson played the titular part.

A representative of The Moving Picture World who saw Mr. Rolfe in the offices of the Alco Company found him to be a man in the early prime of life, well used to success, with ability plainly stamped upon his very appearance. He said that his productions will be marketed by the Alco Company, having closed a satisfactory contract with that corporation.

B. A. Rolfe.

"I expect to release 'Rip Van Winkle' on the 9th of November," continued Mr. Rolfe. "Other prominent artists who will appear in my productions are Mabel Taliaferro and E. J. Conley. E. J. Conley has made a great hit in George Ade's sketch, 'Marse Covington.' We will have Conley in a five-reel production, in which some genuine American humor of Ade's variety will be the chief merits. Another production we intend to release in the near future will be a rendition in motion pictures of the play 'Satan Sanderson,' which had such big vogue at the time. While I have been actively engaged in the amusement business for the last ten or twelve years, having at one time been a partner of Jesse L. Lasky, I realize that the motion picture art is new to me. The motion picture appeals to me now after much study of the subject as the most wonderful of all entertainments and the one with the biggest future. The field for the utilization of motion pictures as a means of entertainment is absolutely without limit. It is truly inexhaustible. From the showman's point of view the motion picture has advantages which no other form of entertainment offers. The legitimate attraction requires endless attention at practically every performance. No two performances are ever perfectly alike. Once, however, the performance is on the film it can never vary. No leading lady can embarrass me with an attack of headache or a suspicion of laryngitis just a few moments before the curtain rises. I intend to devote myself entirely to the bigger sort of productions, which it seems to me are what the public demands to-day. The ordinary picture I confess seems to be losing its appeal. Now I have talked enough; I want to prove what I can do by my next release. I am quite willing to abide by the judgment of the public and the exhibitor."

ROSKAM IN AUTO ACCIDENT.

IT seems that fate and good fortune have been following Edward M. Roskam, president of the Life Photo Film Corporation, in everything that he has undertaken or is interested in.

While driving along the Palisades with the superintendent of the laboratory, Charles Hirliman, his automobile became unmanageable and skidded, sending the two-thousand-pound machine over a ten-foot embankment. Luckily, the machine did not turn turtle, and Mr. Hirliman, with his wonderful presence of mind, shut off the motor, stopping the machine ten feet from the edge of the Palisades. Although the machine is a total wreck, neither Mr. Roskam nor Mr. Hirliman received any injuries.

Mr. Roskam says he now owes his life, as well as the wonderful laboratory work the Life Photo Film Corporation and the Commercial Motion Pictures Company are obtaining, to Charlie.

Eclectic Shows 'Em.

General Manager Kane Says the Exhibitor Is "From Missouri," and Don't Like to Buy a "Pig in a Poke."

"IT is getting harder every day to sell a pig in a poke in the film exchange business. Theater managers more and more are refusing to take a picture because it was made by so and so or appears in this or that program. They are exercising the right of selection and demanding to be shown."

Such was the comment of Arthur S. Kane, general manager of branches of the Eclectic Film Company. Mr. Kane's views are interesting because he is known as one of the best posted men of the industry.

Arthur S. Kane.

"In its infancy as an exchange organization, and it is quite a sturdy youngster now, the Eclectic took the position that the exhibitor 'is from Missouri.' Consequently the twenty-two branch offices were equipped with projection rooms. Anybody can see at any time the film he is being asked to book. This policy has proved a decided hit and is doing a great deal to do away with 'sight unseen" trading between exchange and exhibitor which has hampered the theaters in their search for quality. Customers at first scarcely could believe that any renter was anxious to screen his goods for them. Now they regard it as their one best bet in program building. We feel proud to have been the first to adopt a policy the country over which bids fair to become a necessity everywhere. In doing this we merely have been living up to our name—Eclectic vide W. Stephen Bush on page 1345 of The Moving Picture World of Sept. 5, 1914: "* * * an eclectic program * * * a program chosen absolutely on a basis of merit and quality. The public are tired of the same old time-table kind of 'releases,' they long for a medley of the best and will go in search for it prepared to pay a good deal more than the price of a nickel.

"So will the theater go in search for the best, prepared to pay a great deal more for pictures than for merely reels of film. 'Selecting according to judgment, from different sources,' is the dictionary for eclectic. We reserve to ourselves the right of selection, securing our pictures from a great many producing organizations. We believe the exhibitor has the same privilege and must exercise his right of 'selecting, according to judgment, from different sources,' to achieve quality."

The Eclectic exchange organization, built up by Mr. Kane in the past seven months, has been the talk of the business. Many of the best-known and most successful managers in the country are found in the Eclectic ranks. As assistant in the head office is J. J. Rotchford, while E. Auger, district manager for the East and South, also has his headquarters in New York. District Manager W. R. Scates directs the branches in the Middle West from Chicago. The twenty-two offices operating are in charge of these widely-known managers:

Atlanta, 61 Walton street, G. R. Allison; Dallas, 202 Andrews Building, J. S. Phillips; Chicago, 5 South Wabash avenue, Jno. Hardin; Minneapolis, 109 Kasota Building, Wm. C. Preller; New York, 115 East 23d street, J. Burnstein; Boston, 3 Tremont Row, F. H. Vine; Los Angeles, 114 E. 7th street, B. E. Loper; St. Louis, 3210 Locust street, E. W. Dustin; San Francisco, 67 Turk street, Frank L. Hudson; Syracuse, 214 East Fayette street, A. N. Webster; Pittsburgh, 715 Liberty avenue, A. W. Goff; Cincinnati, 217 East 5th street, S. P. Nicoll; Washington, 7th and E streets, N. W., C. L. Worthington; Kansas City, 928 Main street, C. S. Edwards; Denver, 16th and Larimer streets, J. B. Parker; Omaha, 1312 Farnam street, E. R. "The Temptations of Satan"

Melodrama Cast in the Form of Morality Play Is Successful as Novelty—Five-Reel by Herbert Blache, Warners Features.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE real villain of every true melodrama has always been Satan. To make a melodrama with his sulphurous highness as the actual hero is only calling a spade a spade. But no successful melodrama ever had just "everygirl" for its heroine, or "everyboy" for hero. Yet every girl and boy goes to see him or herself in melodramas. Herbert Blache has these three as the leading characters in his picture, "Satan's Temptations," and we think he has succeeded in getting a higher degree of melodramatic power by thus frankly admitting that his heroine and hero are as individual as every boy and girl and no more so.

Scene from "Temptations of Satan" (Warners).

That he has got an interesting atmosphere of the morality play around his picture we are sure. It is a happily contrived novelty and besides it gives a chance for some new and wholly delightful scenes—among these, perhaps, the best is when Satan rehearses his cast of helpers (semi-theatrical, cabaret characters and the like) before sending them up to the Metropolis to snare and ruin the pretty Everygirl who has a voice and is ambitious. Then Satan, having got the show started, becomes human and follows to see the fun and take part as the double villain. He fits in perfectly. Then the atmosphere of the morality brings out distinctly some of the qualities that are inherent in the melodrama. Melodramas are nothing if not moral. This picture will suggest to thoughtful spectators the seed from which melodramas grew—and, if the mind wants to dwell on it, it will start one on many an interesting cogitation.

The picture has a new taste, yet, aside from its tincture of the formal morality, it is the old melodrama struggle, wholesomely portrayed, of the boy to rescue his sweetheart who, at first, almost becomes a white slave and later, as poor working girl, has to be rescued from foreman and then from owner and then from a sweatshop fire. It is a carefully written and produced picture. There is naturalness and life in its scenes and it entertains. The staging and the photography also are worthy. Everygirl is played by Binnie Burns. Jos. Lovering has the role of Everyboy. Satan is acted by James O'Neil and this competent cast is well supported. It is an offering that we feel very safe in commending highly as an artistically made melodrama that will please both simple and sophisticated minds though it be for different reasons. For if some see humor in it that is hidden from others no fair minded spectator will feel like ridiculing it on any grounds whatever.

"His Trysting Place"

A Two-Reel Keystone That Is a Scream from Beginning to End.

WHO they are cast for is lost in the shuffle. And it really does not make the slightest difference. We begin to laugh within a few seconds after the farce begins and we keep it up until there is really need of tragedy relief. Critics get the frozen face from trying to discover merit where it is most successfully hidden. In the average screen portrayal, they are eternally anxious to find something really praiseworthy that they may not have to compromise with their own consciences, and this is a sad business in

The average picture has about the same effect on me as an after-dinner speech—both are usually inadequate expressions of a desire to make an impression—but I began to snicker as soon as Chaplin started his antics in Scene 1, Act 1, and the two reels slipped away before I realized it, though I will find it no easy matter to tell you what I was laughing at. Who cares?

take care of themselves whatever critics, either favorable or carping, may say. Their commercial value lies in their inherent apposition of good structure, better treatment, and the best of acting. The comic spirit is entirely too deep and subtle for me to define. It defies analysis. The human aspect is certainly dominant. It is funniest when it is rich in defects of character. The incongruity of Chaplin's portrayals, his extreme seriousness, his sober attention to trivialities, his constant errors and as constant resentment of what happens to him, all this has to be seen to be enjoyed. He merely sits down in the kitchen to read the war news, while Mabel tries to tend baby on the kitchen table and make bread at the same time. He leans back and puts one foot on the stove, upsetting the boiling kettle, when a flame leaps up and burns his leg, then trouble begins. There is no end of it. One aggravating triviality leads to another, until we are plunged into the complications of a well-devised screen story.

There might as well be no end to it. No fatigue results from two reels—no fatigue for the spectator. Chaplin must be an acrobat to stand the strain. Mabel helps materially in all the amusing scenes that follow, and she exhibits the endurance of a trained athlete in her strenuous role. "Max" was never funnier than Chaplin, and no attractive comedienne I recall could survive the activities of smiling Mabel and still smile. Great team!

While learned gentlemen are discussing Oedipus and attempting to explain the extremely simple plot of Shakespeare's "Comedy of Errors," the reduplication of a coincidence, we are having more than one veritable "Comedy of Errors" in real life, before our very eyes, so why go so far a-field? The Keystone comedies are delightfully realistic. They are of today. They are not revived skeletons in tawdry costumes. They depict weaknesses which any mixed audience is quick to recognize and enjoy. What they are about is of minor consequence. They start us laughing and keep us laughing, with no other purpose than that of chasing away dull care, and their chief charm seems to lie in their utter unaffectedness. They do not strain for effects nor pretend to be funny, but to all appearances, simply happen to be amusing phases of every-day life.

The Leading Woman's Skeleton

During the production of a big five-reel feature at the Yonkers studio of the Dyreda Art Film Corporation it was necessary for Miss Laura Sawyer, leading woman of this company, to carry a skeleton in several of the scenes, with the result that she and the skeleton became tangled up on a number of occasions, as "he" would invariably try to tango, while Miss Sawyer was trying the hesitation.

This caused several rehearsals and created a great deal of amusement for the large gallery of spectators who had gathered on the front lawn of the studio grounds where this scene was made.

NEW UNIVERSAL BOOKING DEPARTMENT.

The ever increasing demand from leading theaters of the country, which play the most prominent Broadway successes, for Annette Kellerman in the seven-part photoplay masterpiece "Neptune's Daughter," has encouraged the Universal Film Manufacturing Company to establish a special booking department for the purpose of handling this increased volume of business. Past arrangements with the United Booking Offices or any other agencies have been terminated. All inquiries for this attraction from unsold territory should be made direct to the Universal Booking Offices, 1600 Broadway, New York City.

Little Mary Gets Loving Cup

Thirteen Thousand Australian Admirers Send Tokens of Affection—Film Recording Presentation to Be Sent to Sydney.

THERE was a pretty scene enacted at the studio of the Famous Players on Tuesday evening at 6 o'clock when Miss Mary Pickford was presented with a loving cup and album from her admirers in Sydney, Australia. Miss Pickford was working in "The Step-Sister" when Daniel Presentation of Cup to Mary Pickford.

Frohman walked into the range of the camera and stopped proceedings. Miss Pickford, garbed in the robes of a queen, descended from her throne to inquire the cause of the interruption. Mr. Frohman beckoned to Millarde Johnson, of the Australasian Films, Ltd., of Sydney, Australia, standing at the side, to enter the improvised throne room. Mr. Johnson, accompanied by Mrs. Johnson and Miss Duffy, advanced in front of the camera. Mr. Frohman explained to Miss Pickford that Mr. Johnson had brought to her a message from the picture patrons of the far-off city. Mr. Johnson then presented to the popular actress a silver loving cup, explaining that as its inscription indicated it was generally a token of the affection in which Miss Pickford is held by her fellow-townsmen and specifically in honor of her work in "Tess of the Storm Country," in which she had particularly endeared herself to Australians. With the cup was a great album. Mrs. Johnson then presented to Miss Pickford a handsome bouquet of orchids.

The actress made a fitting reply. She was getting along very nicely when suddenly her voice broke, she turned her head and covered her face.

The proceedings had been very carefully rehearsed. Mr. Zukor had been slated for a part in the ceremony, but at the last moment dropped out. He said he feared the presence of too many might detract from the illusion of spontaneity. James Kirkwood, who was directing the picture, took charge of the rehearsal. A large number of players, arrayed in court costumes, were grouped about. The setting was of unusual elaborateness, extending back probably seventy-five feet. When everything seemed satisfactory the lights were thrown on, the camera was turned. It may have been acting at first, but Mr. Frohman entered into the spirit of the occasion, apparently forgetting the fact that the film was recording the scene. Mr. Johnson, too, was thoroughly in earnest. He was executing a commission from his neighbors many thousand miles away. His praise was hearty, his manner sincere; it could not help reaching the heart of the little woman he was addressing. It was the natural thing she should forget she was taking part in a ceremony the record of which was to be carried over land and sea to her friends at the other side of the earth. There was art in the beginning of her response, but it was life at the finish.

The loving cup represented the contributions of 13,651½ Australian pennies. The signatures in the album were of the many contributors. The great volume was bound in the finest of leather. On the cover in raised letters was the inscription "The Roll to Honor Our Little Mary Pickford—a Tribute from Australia." On the initial page were the signatures of the Lord Mayor and the Town Clerk, attested by the municipal seal, said to be the first time it had been used in other than a city document. The idea of the presentation originated with the management and patrons of the Crystal Theater, Sydney, and was heartily seconded by their patrons. In the recording of the ceremony 230 feet of film were used.

Mrs. Laemmle Released By Germans

President Carl Laemmle has received a telegram from Rotterdam which informs him that Maurice Fleckles has succeeded in obtaining the release of Mrs. Laemmle, Mrs. Fleckles and the two Laemmle children, Julius and Rosabelle, who have been detained in Germany since the beginning of hostilities. This greatly relieves the tension, inasmuch as nothing had been heard from them for over a month. The party sailed from Rotterdam the 15th of October and will arrive in New York the 24th on the Holland-American liner "Rotterdam."

Mr. Fleckles left the offices of the Universal nearly a month ago, well supplied with American gold, his mission being to find the Laemmle party, who were in Flieden, the birthplace of Mrs. Laemmle. During his absence no communication reached the anxious relatives on this side, save for the cablegram spoken of herein.

Mr. Fleckles has entirely lived up to all expectations as it was predicted by those who knew the man's character, that he would leave no obstacle unmounted in finding the missing party and bringing them safely out of the stricken territory. Before he sailed, he expressed perfect confidence in the success of his mission, and laughed away the fears generally expressed that he would not be able to bring the ladies through the German lines.

He carried with him a passport signed by the American Secretary of State and Haniel Von Haimshausen, Charge d'Affaires in Washington, as well as personal letters of introduction from Hon. William Jennings Bryan to the American Diplomatic and Consular Officers of the United States and Europe.

EDITH TALIAFERRO WITH LASKY.

COMING on the heels of the announcement that the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company secured Marguerite Clark to appear in the Lasky-Liebler production of "Merely Mary Ann," General Manager Samuel Goldfish, of that concern, announces that arrangements were consummated this week, whereby another prominent actress of the younger generation, Miss Edith Taliaferro, the junior of the famous Taliaferro sisters, is to appear in several Lasky productions.

Edith Taliaferro.

Miss Taliaferro, one of the most successful of the new school of acting, has appeared successful in productions of James H. Stoddard, Olga Nethersole, Sothern and Marlowe, played the part of "Meine" with the elder Thomas Jefferson in "Rip Van Winkle," was in the original company of "Shore Acres," appeared in a prominent role in "Marta of the Lowlands," succeeded Mabel Taliaferro in the role of "Polly" in Frederick Thompson's production of "Polly of the Circus" and for the past three seasons appeared in the leading role in "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," co-starred with her sister in Rita Johnson Young's play, "Young Wisdom," which enjoyed a long run at the Criterion Theater, here.

Just what play Miss Taliaferro will appear in for the Lasky Feature Play Company, has not been announced, but she leaves for Los Angeles next Monday, and will begin work immediately, under the direction of Cecil B. De Mille and Wilfred Buckland.

"The Private Officer"

A Fine Essanay Subject in Two Reels that Will Delight and Mystify Photoplay Lovers.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

I CAN promise photoplay lovers a delightful and mystifying treat in "The Private Officer," a two-reel subject by Essanay which treats of a man's loyalty and devotion to a woman who had discarded him in a moment of pique for a less worthy suitor. The mystery does not lie in the story, but in the filming of it; and while this is by no means the first instance where two characters are impersonated by the same actor at the same time, so far as the screen reveals it, I cannot recall another like case where the plan has been carried out so happily and convincingly, the result being made so by the appearance of many other people on the screen contemporaneously with the two characters impersonated by the same man.

Readers will be pleased to learn that the man who appears in two roles at the same time, and who succeeds in confronting himself by himself, in the person of his rival, is Francis X. Bushman; and that the girl in the case is that other popular Essanay favorite, Miss Beverly Bayne.

The story lays no claim to greatness, but it is quite satisfying in that it reveals the triumph of a man over his natural inclinations for revenge on his successful rival, because he wishes to spare the woman, who has wrongfully dismissed him as a suitor, the pangs of humiliation. We witness a real football match during the story's unwinding, in which Mr. Bushman is seen as the victorious captain of the army team. The grandstand is crowded with enthusiastic onlookers and the rival teams are spurred on to greater efforts by their supporters. This scene was taken on the field of the Northwestern University while a match game was in progress, the Essanay producer cleverly availing himself of actual realism for his production. Another instance of the happy utilization of the real thing for these films is the drilling scene showing army life at Fort Barton. This scene was taken at Fort Sheridan, nearby Chicago, the men being real soldiers drilled by an officer who is just outside the field of the camera, while in the pictures it would appear that Lieut. Frothingham (Francis X. Bushman) is giving the orders.

Exhibitors will no doubt be asked by many of their patrons how it is that Mr. Bushman, as Harry Lampton, and Mr. Bushman, as Lieut. Frothingham, can appear at the same time on the screen, the men being bitter rivals and enemies. It will be noticed in viewing the films that Lampton and Frothingham never appear together on the left side of the screen nor on the right side; but that one is on the right and the other on the left side of the screen when they appear on the screen contemporaneously. The camera man has taken the pictures with only one-half his lens exposed at such times. The scenes on the right-hand side of the screen were taken when the left half of the camera lens was covered by a disc; the scenes on the left were taken when the right half of the lens was covered by a disc. This, of course, means that the camera man, after making the scenes appearing on the right of the screen had to wind his negative film and begin again and take the scenes shown on the left. It is obvious that careful measurements and precautions had to be taken so as to have the scenes on the right and left fit in action, etc., when the entire width of the film is projected on the screen.

Mr. Bushman's acting in these films is in every way worthy, and Miss Beverly Bayne as Muriel, the rich and beautiful heiress, is both fascinating and effective. Thomas Commerford assumes true military and dignified bearing in the part of Colonel Porter, the commander of the regiment to which Lieut. Frothingham and Private Lampton have been assigned. Lester Cuneo fits well in the role of Captain Osborne.

The release date is Friday, October 23.

William D. Taylor

WILLIAM D. TAYLOR was born in Ireland and was educated at Clifton College, England, where he excelled in hurdles and rowing. His ambition was to go into the army and he was duly examined but failed in the eyesight test and had to abandon the idea. Instead he went to France and Germany to study languages and finally came to America and ranched in Southwest Kansas. Returning to England he met Charles Hawtrey, the famous actor and although not quite nineteen joined his company and played in "The Private Secretary."

William D. Taylor.

After playing with a number of traveling companies in the old country William Taylor again crossed the pond and joined Fanny Davenport, playing juveniles and understudying the leading roles at the same time. He stayed with this fine actress for three years and only left her when she died. He played every kind of character with her including leads and transacted much of her business for her which included a yearly journey to Europe for the purchase of properties and costumes. His last legitimate engagement was with Harry Corson Clarke in Honolulu, Hawaii.

William Taylor had the mining fever at one time and was in Telluride, Colorado, and then at Dawson where he made money at first and then lost it in further ventures.

Mr. Taylor started his motion picture career with the "Kay Bee" forces at Santa Monica and then joined the Vitagraph where he did some important work including the name part in "Captain Alvarez," which made such a sensation on Broadway. He is at present with the Balboa Company.

"The Spirit of the Conqueror"

A Five-Reel Phoenix Offering Idealistic Solution of the Labor Problem—Sawyer Release.

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S.T.B.

THE original title of this picture was "Shades, or the Napoleon of Labor," the idea underlying the story being that by means of reincarnation the spirit of Napoleon comes to earth again and uses his great genius to bring about a peaceable solution to the difficulties between capital and labor. The story is simply and directly told along broad lines that take for granted the overcoming of the difficulties involved in the practical working out of the details and the allegorical portions have been most beautifully handled.

Lincoln, Grant. Lee, Benjamin Franklin and Washington

meet in paradise the master of reincarnation and an angel who has just returned from the world, whither he has been sent to investigate the difficulties between capital and labor. After listening to the report of their messenger, these great leaders of men decide that what is needed today is some genius of organization who can lead labor to a universal victory over capital which will bring about a lasting adjustment of all iniquitous relations. The master of reincarnation suggests that one of them go back to earth and be that leader, but they all shrink from the task and finally Washington declares that there is only one genius capable of handling the situation, namely, Napoleon; the difficulty, however, being that the great emperor and war genius may not be willing to turn his talents into the paths of peace. Lincoln volunteers to persuade him, and with the master of reincarnation crosses the Styx to hell, where Napoleon is dwelling disconsolately, and by his arguments fulfills his mission. The master of reincarnations takes the shade of Napoleon to earth and places it in the body of the new-born son of Peter Morgan, the capitalist king. The son grows up, studies social economics, takes issue with his father on the labor question, organizes a universal strike which he engineers to a peaceful victory at the cost of his own life, and the mission of Napoleon's spirit on earth being done it returns to the world of shades and is welcomed into paradise by the great souls that had caused his return to earth.

Of course, a story like this is bound to be more or less unreal, but it has been worked up in an intensely interesting manner, and it is certain to be popular wherever it is shown.

Captain Leslie T. Peacocke

Former Scenario Editor of the Universal Now Preparing Picture Plays for the World Film Corporation.

WORKING quietly on a seven reel feature which bids fair to surpass his "Neptune's Daughter," and at the same time preparing the scenario for the screen version of Wilton Lackaye's feature, "The Pit," and the screen version of "As Ye Sow," in which Alice Brady will star, Captain Leslie T. Peacocke, one of the best known scenario writers, has been too busy to inform his friends that he had joined the staff of the World Film Corporation, and had been at work for weeks before they learned of his change of position. Now that he has finished his work on "The Pit," and "As Ye Sow," and is hard at it again making a photoplay for Clara Kimball Young, from Henry Kitchell Webster's story of "The Butterfly," he feels that he could take a few moments to come to the city and tell us of his plans.

Capt. Leslie T. Peacocke.

Captain Peacocke informs us that the seven reel feature upon which he spent so much time and has worked so secretly, is to be an absolute novelty and that 100 of the most beautiful women in the world will take part in the picture. The delicate work of selecting the respective beauties is now being done at the Peerless Studio, of the World Film Corporation, at Fort Lee, N. J., and all the nations are sure to be represented in the choice of the 100 beauties. Further information on this the captain refuses to give out, but one may be sure that the man who has written several hundred successful photoplays and who has been a standby of every organization that he has been associated with, may be expected to deliver the goods when he announces that there will be 100 beautiful women in this feature.

So much has been written about the Captain that he is as well known as many of the players who have appeared in his photoplays, but it's not amiss at this time to mention the fact that the Captain is of English birth. He served in India as an officer in the 88th regiment. He became interested in literature when he worked as a correspondent for the Irish Times, while in his native land. There is hardly a successful magazine published in either America, England, Canada, or the Orient, that has not published one of the captain's stories. For several years Captain Peacocke was the feature writer for the Los Angeles Times, which has a reputation second to none in this country, as a unique newspaper. A. H. Woods has several of the Captain's three act plays in his possession and he is also the author of various vaudeville sketches which has been staged in the past three years. "Lady Pat," one of the Captain's stories, which was published in the Smart Set, was presented before the Viceroy of India last year by Captain Peacocke's sister (Lady Gardner) and Captain Philip Scott, son of the late Clement Scott, the noted English Dramatic critic.

"The County Chairman"

Maclyn Arbuckle Does Good Work in Famous Players' Five-Part Adaptation of George Ade's Comedy-Drama.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IN the Famous Players' five-part adaptation of "The County Chairman," George Ade's well-known comedy, Maclyn Arbuckle is seen in the characterization in which he is so familiar to playgoers—that of the title role. Mr. Arbuckle as the rural politician hews close to the line of life. By his work he does much to offset the absence of the snappy dialogue of the master humorist who created the play. He shows us that the country politician obtains results much after the fashion of the urban ruler; it is only a difference of degree. Jim Hackler's best arguments are the cigars which he distributes with a lavish hand; and we see, also, there is a difference in degrees in the smokes, too. The good ones are stored in the inside of the ample waistcoat; the others are "rank outsiders," indeed.

Scene from "The County Chairman" (Famous Players).

The whole story is of a rural community. The atmosphere is well established and maintained. There is a background of romance in the love of the young candidate for the daughter of Rigby, his opponent for the district attorneyship, and also in the fact that Rigby away back in Civil War days had, through unfair means, robbed Hackler of his sweetheart. Hackler takes a savage joy in the management of the campaign of Wheeler, who is also his friend as well as partner. If he succeeds he not only gets his associate into office over the head of the man he "hates clean through;" but through his uncovering of rascality on the part of Rigby he also insures the union of his friend and Lucy. So there is drama in "The County Chairman" as well as comedy.

The period of the action is about 1880. Many factors point to this time, not the least of which is the old-time "ordinary" bicycle, with its big and little wheel. On the lighter side there are many contributing characters. Willis P. Sweatnam, from the original cast, is Sassafras Livingston, a colored man, who, among other things, likes chickens and cigars; Wellington Playter is Whittaker, selling windmills and falling in love; Helen Aubrey is Mrs. Rigby, who figures more on the serious side of the story. There are shouting throngs and fearfully arrayed bands of "music," and all the clatter and clutter of election time. The illusion of the country band was made more marked in the showing at the Strand by the pronounced discords of the brasses in the orchestra.

The best part of the picture is in the last two reels. The comedy here merges more into the drama, and there is perceptible quickening of the interest, an acceleration of the action that once or twice has shown a tendency to droop. The situation in Hackler's office, as he confronts Rigby with the proofs of his defalcation of the funds of little Chick, and then reviews the villainy of Rigby in the army days when the latter, taking advantage of his place as orderly sergeant, had withheld the letters passing between Hackler and his sweetheart, are strong. So, too, is the final scene, where Hackler kisses the hand of Mrs. Rigby, intimating—and just intimating—to the sweetheart of his youth that the old flame still burns.

Harold Lockwood and Daisy Robinson, as Wheeler and Lucy Rigby respectively, acceptably interpret the leading younger roles. William Lloyd finely typifies Elias Rigby, the unscrupulous candidate. It is Mr. Arbuckle, however, who is the center of interest all the way.

Margarita Fischer

MARGARITA FISCHER was born in the Missouri Valley, Iowa, and her family moved West to Salem, Oregon, while she was a baby. When she was eight years old a manager persuaded her father to let the child take a part in "The Celebrated Case," which he did unwillingly, but her talent and charm were so notable that he decided to let Margarita adopt the stage as a profession. After a series of child parts Mr. Fischer formed a company, featuring Miss Fischer, and himself assumed the management and from that day to this she has always been a popular favorite and never idle. The company toured for seven years, Margarita playing the leads and her elder sister, known as Mary Scott, taking the character parts.

Margarita Fischer.

At the age of fourteen Margarita, who up to that time had been known as Babe Fischer, put her foot down and insisted upon being known as Margarita as she was taking parts in long trains; in fact, their repertoire covered every conceivable style and variety of play, the finest education a young actress ever had. One day she would be Mary Magdalene and the following night romp through Topsy in "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Then her father died and Margarita took the fortunes of her family into her own small hands and secured an engagement to play leads with Walter Sanford in San Francisco. After a period of stock she and Harry Pollard toured the country with a vaudeville sketch entitled "When Hearts Were Trumps." She also took leads with T. Daniel Frawley and played with Grace George at the Grand Opera House, Chicago. Following this she was starred by Joseph M. Patterson in "By Products."

Margarita Fischer then started with Harry Pollard in their association with the motion pictures and accepted an engagement with the Selig Polyscope Company, where they remained for nine months. Then they went to Arizona with the American and left to join the Imp company at a big salary, then came West with the Imp and when the company became an integral part of the Universal, Miss Fischer played under the Nestor and then the Rex brands. This led to the flattering offer from the American and their alliance with the Mutual program under the new brand known as the "Beauty."

"The Old Fogey"

Dramatic Three-Reel Pathe Offering Catches Circus People with the Paint Off—Will Hold Strongly.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

WE have had circus pictures. This is distinct—at once vigorous and different from the others. It isn't one of the old ones revamped. The interesting character of the story is not the "old fogey," but the woman. The fogey is a bookkeeper, and in his youth he had loved a girl, but lost her to a circus hero. He wouldn't have gone to a circus again, but his employer's little daughter wanted someone to take her to see a circus. He is startled to find his old sweetheart there.

The poor old fogey has really sentimental dreams of what "might have been." Contrasting with these are the scenes giving a pretty truthful idea of circus love and the sordidness of "sawdust" life. This is brought out in clear, round terms; it is not left shadowy, and the picture in doing this becomes deeply interesting. The chief way the circus's state of grace, or lack of it, is made clear to us is through the character of the woman whose willingness to fleece the old fogey for her unscrupulous circus lover leads up to a tensely melodramatic climax, for she finds him with the other woman and immediately sees into his duplicity.

Scene from "The Old Fogey" (Pathe).

It is a very satisfactory and ably acted scene. The background is the office car of the circus train. It has desk, safe and closet. The circus man is there with the other woman, who hides when the first woman comes bringing ten thousand dollars. She had just coaxed it out of her old flame, the fogey. The old fogey who had "borrowed" it from his employer for her for a day so that she can "clear off a mortgage and so get a fair price for the farm" finds that her story is all a lie and follows. He sees the money there in the circus man's hand, but the woman tells him that he is dreaming and that she never borrowed a cent from him. The old man leaves, and the hidden woman comes from the closet. There could hardly be a better, melodramatic disillusioning of one who had sold herself for evil and found that it is ashes and nothing but ashes. And the way she acts is convincing absolutely.

The woman is played by Nell Craig, who gets her character over to the spectators with melodramatic power. She will be liked in the end for her sorrows in spite of the evil she had done. Sam Coit has the role of the old fogey and furnishes what was needed. The other characters also are well and clearly presented and support the leaders strongly. A real circus furnishes the backgrounds and there is nothing in it that seems awkward, unnatural or cheap. We believe it a very good melodramatic offering.

Dorothy Kelly.

DOROTHY (DOT) KELLY, one of the popular members of the Vitagraph Stock Company, has been the most extensive individual buyer of milk for personal use, the past thirty days, of any person in Greater New York, and all because a friend told her an external and internal application of milk would insure her a lasting peach-blown complexion and increase her avoirdupois. Not that Dot wished particularly to become fleshy, but more to add just a few pounds to her weight, she followed the advice of her friend. Morning, noon and evening and just before retiring, Dot drank a full quart of milk, but she began to get thin and applications on her face began to harden her skin and make her face look leathery. She changed her brand, but to no purpose. She tried milk from various creameries and of every grade obtainable, but kept getting thinner. She purchased a cow, but even the freshest of fresh milk did not produce any change, but for the worst. In desperation, Dot consulted a doctor, who, after a careful diagnosis, informed her there was a trace of acid in her blood that revolted at milk diet and to stop using it altogether. The dispensers of milk have now lost a good customer, and Dot, who is her jolly self once more, is going to let Dame Nature take care of her complexion and her weight.

PITTSBURGH MEN CONDEMN LEGAL CENSORSHIP.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, of Pittsburgh, Pa., held its regular semi-monthly meeting on October 12. President John R. Goble was in the chair. The organization is in a flourishing condition. Three new members were enrolled. Many matters connected with the picture industry were discussed and resolutions were adopted condemning the proposed Pennsylvania building code, as well as all forms of legal censorship as follows:

"Resolved, that every member of this association shall interview, either by letter or verbally, his respective representative of the district in which he is located, and to use every effort for the defeat of the present suggested state building code governing motion picture theaters, when the same is brought before the legislative body for consideration. The code, we believe, is too stringent and would incur great expense, and from past and present conditions in motion picture theaters is unnecessary. It will be the means of eliminating the poor man's entertainment, in our opinion, in suburbs of large cities and in towns of small population. Also to use influence against any and all kinds of legal censorship of motion picture films, which in the opinion of a great many of our best citizens, and we believe to be a fact, is un-American; and

"It is further resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Moving Picture World, for immediate publication, asking the co-operation of every exhibitor, whether a member of the association or not."

Philbin, of the East.....Robert Kegerreis

MR. SEAY has already shown that he can write a play as well as direct one, and the director of "The Everlasting Triangle," Mr. John H. Collins, has qualified, beyond a shadow of doubt, for his work. The result is a complete and artistic visualization, though it must be admitted that the cast has much to do with this adequate presentation of a time-honored problem. Mr. Frank McGlynn as "Santley" performs his role with delightful consistency—he is the exact type—and both Mabel Trunnelle and Robert Kegerreis respond to the requirements of their parts with intelligence. The story is only what it pretends to be, the rivalry of two men for a woman they both love—its chief merits lie in admirable construction on the part of Mr. Seay and nice handling by Mr. Collins.

The story starts with the attentions of a supposed "Easterner" to the woman, and shifts rapidly to the sailor-like courtship of the "Westerner." He carries things by storm and has the girl married to him before his rival can get in an argument edgeways. The latter is compelled to return home because of a bar-room brawl, but he leaves a dangerous connecting thread behind. He tells the young lady of his choice, now married, "In six months you will be like a bird of Paradise, with broken wings and faded feathers." He offers to save her from the life she has chosen if she ever wearies of it and returns East to bide his time.

Life with the western gentleman becomes one of extreme loneliness for the young wife when he carries her off to a secluded shack in the hills, remote from civilization, where he is prospecting. She pines during long weary hours and finally writes for the Easterner to come and take her away. He arrives from the East in a flash, and they run away, riding two horses for this purpose. Neither seems to have a very clear idea of the road to their destination, for they wander into the desert. They are trailed by the vindictive husband and caught as they are quietly sleeping on the sand. He covers both with his revolver, after disarming his rival and destroys two of the horses. He then proposes a game of cards to settle who shall have the remaining horse. The woman wins.

Like a sensible creature, she rides away and leaves the two males to fight it out. The Westerner now makes a perilous proposition. They are to cut cards to see which shall die the lingering death. He wins, and the rival crawls away to a death of agony. The dishonored husband waits until this is accomplished, and then consigns his soul to his Maker and goes the short way with a pistol shot. What becomes of the cause of it all is not revealed, but there is nothing to prevent us from hoping that she mended her ways.

Miss Betty Harte

BETTY HARTE, leading woman of the Victory Company, has just returned from Bermuda after a six months' sojourn at that place, where, under the capable direction of James Gordon, several pictures were made.

Miss Harte was born in Philadelphia, Pa., and while a child played a number of child characters at amateur theatrical entertainments in and about that city. She created such a favorable impression that when a little older she was offered and accepted a position in a Los Angeles, Cal., stock company where she remained for several years.

Miss Betty Harte.

While making a visit to the Selig studios at Los Angeles, Miss Harte was induced to pose for a picture, and the work so fascinated her that she severed her connections with the legitimate stage and has been in the pictures ever since, and with marked success. She remained with the Selig Company for over three years and during that time was leading woman for Hobart Bosworth for two years. Miss Harte, while playing with Mr. Bosworth, appeared in several of the famous Selig animal pictures and had some very thrilling experiences, and on one occasion a large puma cat escaped from his chain and had Miss Harte not retained her presence of mind she would have undoubtedly been literally torn to pieces.

Miss Harte is an experienced horsewoman, swims, and, in fact, is athletic in every sense of the word. She is very versatile and, while with Selig, played the boy in their well-known picturization of "The Spy," with Bosworth. She has written a number of her own pictures and always finds a ready market for her scenarios. "The Token of Gratitude," "The Bridge of Sighs," "Their Only Son," "The Spy," "The Little Stowaway," "The Island Wildflower" are a few of the pictures she has written.

After leaving the Selig Company, Miss Harte joined the Edison Company on the Coast at their Long Beach studio and later came to the Famous Players Company and worked under the direction of J. Searle Dawley in a number of his pictures.

Becoming associated with the Victory Company, Miss Harte has played the female leads in all their pictures, and her work in "The Mystery of the Poison Pool," which was shown at the New York Theater, has created considerable favorable comment.

"Perils of Pauline"

Villain Feeds Deadly Germs to Pauline to Make Her Want to Keep Under Water—Lake Is Near By.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS is the sixteenth of the "Perils of Pauline" series and is another self-contained melodrama two reels long. We have a new kind of peril introduced. The villainous guardian has found that a scientist has in his laboratory any number of germs. One kind is particularly dangerous; it causes a new disease of which one sympton is an uncontrollable desire to submerge oneself in water. The germs are sprinkled over candy in a box at Pauline's hand. She eats of them and the rest are thrown away where the dog licking them over, also gets some of the virus. It gives quite a punch to the story, furnishing an example of the havoc the germs cause. The dog takes to the water and we see him going down in the lake for the last time.

Scene from "The Perils of Pauline" (Eclectic).

Pauline, after eating of the candy, motors off with Eleanor to the camp in the Adirondacks. The guardian and the gypsy follow. On the way they look up a derelict doctor and arrange to have him come when Pauline gets sick so that she won't have any chance of getting well. She begins to want water as soon as she reaches the camp—not only to drink it, but to splash it over herself. The villains have cut the wire and no doctor can be called up. But the guardian offers to look for one and finds the all-ready-procured evil doctor "passing." This doctor wants to operate for appendicitis. Harry "smells a rat" and puts everybody down in the cellar while he gets the great professor from whose laboratory the germs came. While he is gone, Pauline makes for the lake and the gypsy accomplice sets the prisoners free. Harry coming back and finding how things stand, dashes away on a motorcycle to the lake; down a steep hill at speed and swims out just in time to make a rescue. The acting of this cast—Pearl White, Paul Panzar, Crane Wilbur, Clifford Bruce and the others, including Eleanor Woodruff—surely need not be dwelt upon at length. Everyone knows that it is excellent. The offering makes good entertainment mostly because the author, Charles Goddard, knows the Popular Plays and Players were "Michael Strogoff" and and staging.

CARLETON GOES TO FOX.

Lloyd B. Carleton, formerly in the employ of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, has joined the Box Office Attraction Company, and is now actively engaged in the producing of "The Walls of Jericho." The play features Edmund Breese, the Broadway star, in the leading role. While in the employ of the Lubin Company, Mr. Carleton produced a number of the Lubin features. Two which he made for the Popular Plays and Players were "Michael Strogoff" and Andrew Mack in "The Ragged Earl," which are now being released on the Alco program.

Carleton's two-reel Lubin pictures gained quite a good bit of popularity. His close study of the motion picture business from an artistic standpoint has been a valuable asset to him. He is very enthusiastic over his latest production, and is of the opinion that it will be the best of all the picturizations of legitimate plays he has yet attempted. Supporting Edmund Breese in this production are a number of well-known players who deserted the legitimate to appear in "The Walls of Jericho."

"An Old Timer"

Will S. Rising, Dean of M. P. Actors and Producers, in Past Performances.

"YOUNG BILL" was the first actor and singer of prominence to enter the field of the silent drama. He has successively run the scale as actor, scenario editor, director and lecturer, bringing with him the knowledge gleaned by long study and experience in Italy, Paris, London and the United States in opera (grand and comic), comedy and drama. He sang in the first phonographs exhibited personally by Thomas A. Edison, appeared in the first Edison motion picture and later in Edison talking pictures, quite an Edison record.

Will S. Rising.

When reminiscent he recalls the early days of the silent drama when with Ed Porter (Edison), the actors carried their own costumes trudging through the snows of Jersey and Connecticut, making their changes in weather-beaten barns with the cows, sheep, chickens and owls looking on in wild, wide-eyed wonderment. He tells of the Vitagraph studio on the roof of the Nassau street building, when "Pop" (Willie) Rock would cuss at the steam blowing across the camera from Nicholas Powers' factory and Messrs. Smith and Blackton would pipe all hands on deck and hustle "Pop" to the poop-deck.

Also relates how Bill Steiner and Bill Paley took pictures on Proctor's roof, returning the scenery to the stage for the matinees; when Jules Brierlatour was agent for Lumiere. Rising rented camera and camera man for exclusive privilege of taking the Coney Island carnival. They returned with a thousand feet of blank films and an out-of-focus parade. The camera man, then a novice, is now an expert. Rising was with the Cameraphone and with "Bert" Whitman and Geo. Emerson formed the Actophone Co., with men like Ed Porter, Gene Sawyer, Gene Barimore, Johnny Mitchell, Drew Morton, Sidney Golden and Will Rising as directors. The affairs of the Actophone Company were never settled and are still in the courts.

Will Rising produced the first feature in America following the Passion Play. This was "Pocahontas and Colonial Virginia," which he wrote and produced for the Jamestown Exposition. Later he wrote and superintended the production of "Hands Across the Sea," the first American-Eclair release—a four-reel subject. Certainly a good record and not a "flour-flush."

KLEINE SUBJECT FEATURING FRANCESCA BERTINI.

"The Woman Who Dared," featuring Francesca Bertini, is the title of a new five-part subject to be booked through the various Kleine branch offices next month. Miss Francesca Bertini, well known to American picture fans, plays the lead in a story which fairly sparkles with dramatic situations and daring exploits. Important war plans having been stolen by a foreign spy from the count's office, the count is thrown into prison. His wife (Miss Bertini) then starts a fight for his freedom as daring and original as it is unique. Posing as a circus rider, she visits the haunts of the spy, entices him into a flirtation and then, in an unusually powerful situation, forces the papers from his hand. An exciting race between a railway locomotive and a flying automobile makes a striking climax. The story moves rapidly from the start of the first reel and never falters for a moment. "The Woman Who Dared" is a vehicle well suited to Miss Bertini's temperament and abilities and is unquestionably her best work.

"Trapped by the Camera"

Again the Mystery Deepens—True Feature Company Offers a New and Entertaining Detective Story in Four Parts.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE greatest detective in the world is the hero of this picture-play of mystery—the motion picture camera. We have heard William J. Burns call it so. He said it was the detective of the future. The human hero is Stewart Webb, one of those high-class detectives with all the truly romantic brain-power, keenness of sight and humor—Burns has humor, too—that the world demands of such. He is called upon and efficiently solves, though not at once or without preliminary failure, a mystery that in the beginning seems but a touch of nerves in an elderly professor.

Scene from "Trapped by Camera" (True).

This gives the spectator a chance to guess his way into the mystery and a bit later gives him the pleasure of finding that he didn't guess right. The plot thickens and he is now willing to watch the detective do the guessing.

Only adventurous people go out and hunt experiences that are full of suspense. Every one likes to sit in a theater and see the thing put on a screen. If one found that there was a secret panel in the house he has been living in and found that by pushing a button a cylinder of stone and concrete revolved and brought a niche to the fore just big enough to stand in, to stand in that niche and push the button and revolve with the cylinder to that unknown other side would be an adventure. In a house where mysterious things had been happening, some would not dare to push the button, unless some one else stood in the niche. When the detective pushes such a button is one of the best moments in the picture. It is amply convincing and effective. The picture has other good things. It is well written and between its exciting points it has action skillfully contrived to suggest that something exciting is right at hand, so it engages our attention and keeps it.

In the beginning of the story, a professor finds that his desk is tampered with in the night. Nothing is stolen, but it makes him nervous, because it happens so often and he complains to the police. They come, but fail to get any definite clues, so the professor calls on Webb. Webb looking over the premises, notices a captain entering and is told that he is a friend and that his apartments are on the floor above. It soon transpires that the nights when the desk of the professor is tampered with are only those on which the captain brings home important papers to work on at night. Webb decides to watch. Next morning he is found securely bound and helpless. He doesn't know what has done it. After thinking, he proposes to set up a motion camera with electric attachment to snap any intruder who approaches the desk. The professor, the captain and he sit up and wait. The camera flashes; they rush in; but the room is already empty and the only clue is a false key to the locker of the captain's room up stairs. The wall sounds a bit hollow. A carpenter finds some peculiar wires embedded in the wall and these, short-circuited, reveal the unknown panel and the revolving cylinder. It leads through a romantic series of galleries to an outlet in the well. The camera when its film his been developed shows just a snatch of the intruder, merely enough to suggest to the detective the next step. He captures the man, puts him in the cylinder and then entering the room where the professor is entertaining the police chief and the captain, he pushes the button and reveals the cuprit handcuffed.

The picture has very few weak places; but such pictures need to keep the spectator wondering and would be strengthened by the cutting of a few feet near the end. If it showed us the detective coming from the barber shop with the culprit and then the scenes following were skipped until we saw the detective coming once more from the well. we wouldn't know what had happened. Then when he pushed the button and the culprit appeared with the hand-cuffs on, it would solve our wonder.

The picture is well acted, and the staging and camera work are both commendable. Some of the staging is particularly praiseworthy—that bit showing the four rooms and the galleries between. for instance. It makes a good feature offering.

Utah League Active

Exhibitors' Organization Extends Its Influence to Adjacent States.

PURSUANT to a special call, eighteen members of the Utah State Exhibitors' League met at the Semloh hotel, Salt Lake City, Wednesday, October 7, and canvassed preliminary details looking to the enlargement of scope and the taking into the organization all of the intermountain states not yet organized. The proposed new undertaking is to be named The Inter-Mountain States Exhibitors' League and will include the motion picture men of Utah, Idaho, Nevada and Wyoming.

Steps were taken in the direction of appointing a traveling representative to work up the proposition with the object in view of acquiring the necessary strength with which to become affiliated with the national organization.

An educational committee also was appointed which included the following: Charles Kent, chairman, E. Mehesey, A. J. Davis, Salt Lake; John T. Horne, Logan; E. G. Epperson, Provo, and E. C. Purrington, American Fork. Among other things this committee is expected to get busy on the threatened censorship, Sunday closing and other propositions that are destined to come up before the next legislature.

The grievance committee at the meeting discussed the free coupon situation in Salt Lake indulged in by three of the leading houses, together with two vaudeville theaters and the stock house whereby, it was declared, 20,000 passes were distributed each week by the process of clipping coupons from the newspapers.

The officers of the Utah State Exhibitors' League which was organized June 24, 1913, are: James S. Barlow, Murray, president; Clifton Pierce, Springville, first vice-president; E. J. Rhoades, Eureka, second vice-president; A. L. Stalling, Provo, treasurer; George M. Blackburn, Salt Lake, secretary.

A meeting is to be called of the exhibitors of the four inter-mountain states at an early date to organize and elect officers, when the existing state league will go out of existence.

"The Jungle Master"

Wild Animals Aplenty Give Thrills to 101 Bison Two-Reeler Telling African Jungle Love-Story.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

WILD animals in pictures have been more than amply justified from a commercial viewpoint. And they may be justified artistically, too, as at this picture's climax where an enraged lioness, deprived of her cubs, gives a decided punch to the story. The picture is "The Jungle Master," and was produced by Henry McRae from a script by H. G. Stafford from a story by Rex de Roselli, and it fairly teems with wild animals—elephants, lions, leopards, jackalls, wild boars, monkeys and chimpanzees, and snakes. The love-story actually depends on some of these and all of them give a feeling of actuality to the background. And, although the incidents that bring them into the action are only now and then actually necessary to it, these incidents are always interesting and often thrilling.

The story is of love and insane jealousy. Its heroine (Marie Walcamp) is the daughter of a circus man (Rex de Roselli), in Africa to get animals. Marie's lover, Clifford (William Clifford) is with her father and they are stopping with Paul (Val Paul), an Anglo-African animal catcher. Paul grows jealous of Clifford and the story grows from this. The "jungle master" is Roselli. An interpolated story recounts how he came to find that he was possessor of almost mystic powers over wild creatures and the denouement of the story gives him a chance to use it to save his daughter from the claws of a lioness whose cub she had taken. Paul, in his jealousy, had set the beast loose with malice prepense.

The photography is clear and the incidents follow each other with great rapidity—so that one astonishing animal scene comes upon another until we feel that the forest is full of wild life, the stronger preying on the weaker, and full of danger, too, for anyone straying unguardedly among the trees or the cane breaks. It is an offering that is quite sure to go well and will be tremendously thrilling in places where adequate sound-effects can imitate the jungle cries.

"Zudora" With Marguerite Snow

"ZUDORA," another absorbingly interesting serial, is to be produced by the Thanhouser Film Corporation as successor to "The Million Dollar Mystery." Daniel Carson Goodman is the author of the new serial which will be released in two reel episodes, each of which will be a story complete in itself. Harold MacGrath, who novelized "Kathlyn," and "The Million Dollar Mystery," will write the newspaper version of "Zudora." All the newspapers throughout the country now running the "Mystery" story have taken unto themselves the new serial. Mr. Goodman through "The Escape," "The Battle of the Sexes," and "The Avenging Conscience," all Broadway successes, has a definite value to the exhibitor booking "Zudora." He is admitted to be the photoplay author-genius of Broadway.

Miss Marguerite Snow.

In "Zudora" will be more scenes than in all the plays of the Bard of Avon, a distinction in itself. The title of the first episode gives an idea of the mystic theme on which "Zudora" is predicated. "The Mystic Message of the Spotted Collar," is the title of the first release. A cast of three principals will run through the twenty episodes—they to be supported by one thousand people, a construction never before attempted in photoplay production or for that matter, on the speaking stage.

Marguerite Snow, whose Countess Olga, in "The Million Dollar Mystery," has cemented her in the hearts of a nation's motion picture fans, will play Zudora. She is wonderfully fitted for the role, which will give her admirers the opportunity to see this remarkable young woman at her best, the role demanding the complete gamut of emotions and a more definite histrionic ability than is the usual requirement. James Cruze, the reporter-hero in "The Million Dollar Mystery," will play Hassam Ali, a weird oriental character around whose mysticism revolves much of the story. Harry Benham whose work as a Thanhouser leading man is well known will play John Storm, the young lover of Zudora. This newest of serials will be presented by the Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation.

HEARST-SELIG WAR SCENES.

Announcement is made by the Hearst-Selig News pictorial that it will shortly release as a part of its regular news reel, first and exclusive pictures showing the ruins of the Belgian City of Louvain, burned by the German army after, it is alleged, non-combatants had fired upon and "sniped" the victorious troops of the Kaiser. Various stories have been told of the destruction of Louvain, which act arouses the protest of the civilized world, and was only exceeded by that indignation expressed in every quarter of the globe by the alleged unwarranted destruction of the Cathedral of Notre Dame at Rheims.

Some 650 feet, showing the blackened ruins of Louvain have been received in the United States by the Hearst-Selig News Pictorial, and within a few days will be shown upon the screen in all parts of the country.

In view of the siege of Antwerp, and the imminent fall of that city, 450 feet of negative received by the Hearst-Selig News Pictorial, showing scenes around Antwerp and Malines, the Belgian army preparing to resist the siege, and the flight of the non-combatant populace, should make a particularly interesting feature. These pictures will shortly be released in the Hearst-Selig News Pictorial.

"The Riddle of the Green Umbrella"

A New Madelyn Mack Story in Which the Girl Detective, Played by Alice Joyce, Unravels a Murder Mystery of a College Town.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

ALL the newest appliances of use to detectives have a place in this up-to-date tale of mystery, which is woven around a professor's green umbrella. This is true so far, at least, that the girl detective uses a vocophone, a detectophone and a recordophone, the latter a new invention of her own. We see these instruments and how they are used. The story is very fair and has been carefully put on with a personal cast by a skillful director. Its object is to show us certain things transpiring, to make us wonder how they came about, and then to give the explanation, which it aims to make different from what we guessed. In sufficient measure, it reaches this object.

The opening scenes introduce to us Professor Helmar (James

Scene from "The Riddle of the Green Umbrella" (Kalem).

Ross) of a large university, and his pretty daughter Dorothy (Marguerite Courtot). Then we meet Professor Reynolds (Jere Austin) whose specialty is chemistry and an expert on all kinds of deadly poisons. This man is in love with Dorothy; but she favors Professor Lloyd (Guy Coombs) and Reynolds is jealous. The girl's father has a curious umbrella with a handle made from an old Borgia weapon—a spring in it releases a needle which was poisoned and, in the old days, caused sudden death. There is an evening party, and Dorothy shows this curio to the professors.

We find out that Professor Reynolds is in debt to the university funds in his possession to the extent of ten thousand dollars. He is accused of peculation by both Dorothy's father and by Professor Lloyd. In revenge he determines to do away with both. He dresses up as a tramp and takes a portion of the world's most deadly poison. Professor Helmar walks into a barber shop and, leaving his green umbrella in the rack, is getting shaved. The barber discovers that he is dead. How did he die? Reynolds did it, we suspect, but how? The world thinks that the green umbrella is the cause; but quickly Reynolds acts to forestall the supposition. He gets hold of the account books showing his embezzlement and changes them to make Lloyd seem the guilty one. He brings the police to Lloyd's rooms and a bottle of the deadly poison is found there. Circumstantial evidence of a crime and an ample motive are thus established and Lloyd is arrested.

To go back a bit in the story, it has been shown that Dorothy has a dear friend, Madelyn Mack (Alice Joyce), the girl detective. She brings Dorothy to the police station to give witness and there Lloyd is brought in so Madelyn finds how much Dorothy loves him. Also she is far from satisfied with the evidence and suspects Reynolds. Getting a job as house-maid in the apartment where he lives, she finds enough evidence to convince her that she is on the right track. She installs the vocophone and other apparatus in the fireplace of his room and carries the wires up the chimney, bringing the ends to a room adjoining.

The vocophone permits her not only to hear what is said in his room; but to speak through it. She thus makes Reynolds hear ghostly accusations and it nearly drives him mad. Then she confronts him in his room. He admits that he did the murder and tells her that he is going to take away her mind with a poison. She has stationed two police officers outside and they arrive in time to find that she, by throwing the poison back into Reynold's eyes, has killed him. His confession is safe on the cylinder of the detectophone, which has recorded every word he has uttered, and so Lloyd, the prisoner, is permitted to go free, and Dorothy and he are happy. Miss Mack tells the police how the crime happened.

The story has its somewhat illogical incidents as most of these detective stories—we might almost say everyone of them—have; but the object of this kind of production is accomplished if the spectator is held in suspense. This the picture does in acceptable degree, and it can be counted a safe offering.

C. R: Seelye

C. R. SEELYE has just been appointed to the position of director of sales with the World Film Corporation. Mr. Seelye is an expert sales manager and organizer, who has done brilliant work handling the advertising service department with the South Bend Watch Company, and later R. H. Ingersoll & Bro., whose product is known as "the watch that made the dollar famous." More recently Mr. Seelye organized in the brief period of six months a new sales force and policy for the New Era Manufacturing Company, which up to the time he took charge of the sales department, had been losing money. His methods turned the scale, and within a few months the company was on the high road to success.

C. R. Seelye.

While superintendent of sales of the South Bend Watch Company, Mr. Seelye wrote a sales manual that schooled the selling force to present a standard selling talk which was pronounced to be the best of its kind by Sheldon, the famous sales expert. He helped plan and execute the sales campaign for the South Bend organization, which has been pronounced one of the best examples of manufacturer and dealer co-operation in America. What his plans are for the World Film Corporation, Mr. Seelye is not yet ready to say, but his slogan in the commercial field has been, that advertising must go hand in hand with selling, further, the service that the retailer gets from the manufacturer is the only foundation upon which a prosperous business can be built.

After looking over the moving picture field, Mr. Seelye has come to the conclusion that the same policy holds true in that field, and for the World Film Corporation class "A" feature films he plans to work out a selling system that will be in keeping with the quality of the features marketed by that company.

MISS PICKFORD TO BE SEEN IN "ESMERALDA."

For some time past the Famous Players' Company has been receiving requests from exhibitors and the public to star Mary Pickford in a film version of the celebrated play "Esmeralda." In order to comply with these numerous petitions and at an enormous cost the company has now secured this favorite drama by Frances Hodgson Burnett and William H. Gillette, in which Miss Pickford will be presented within the next few months.

Miss Pickford's famed mastery of the art of blending comedy and pathos will have full sway in the role of "Esmeralda," the little country girl who suddenly becomes an heiress and is torn away from home and farmer-lover by an ambitious and mercenary mother. "Esmeralda" is one of the most notable successes that ever came from the pen of its author, and its charm and appeal should be continued and even increased in the motion picture production.

"When Broadway Was a Trail"

"Holds With Steady Interest" Is the Sure Phrase for the Latest World Film Five-Reel Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

GOOD pictures of olden times in America are wanted by present day American audiences, and we feel quite sure that "When Broadway Was a Trail," telling as it does a love story which a Puritan maid of old Danvers (Salem) is the heroine, and the hero a son of Governor Minuet of New Amsterdam, will be counted one of the best of its kind. There are five reels of it, and it surely isn't an inch too long, nor is there in it a scene that isn't interesting. The story is too good and too well told to be hampered by its shortcomings, so with these we don't need linger. Everyone will see them; but then Everyone will be so entertained by the tale that he won't stop to do so. It is a delightful offering.

The best thing about the picture is the simple, straightforward way in which it tells its story, unless one counts as best the wholesome, pleasing quality of its romance. It is wholly in the realm of romance with no invidious underthrusts, political or religious, to mar its beauty. The next best thing about it is the careful composition of its big scenes—perhaps at times they approach paintings in their effect and so lose something of vivacity and spontaneity, but they are well done and beautiful. The acting, especially of the leading characters, is also pleasing. Barbara Tennant takes the part of Priscilla Elliott, the Puritan maid, and A. O. C. Lund, himself the author of the story, plays Henry Minuet, son of the Dutch governor. They are excellently well supported, too, and the scenes—they adhere a bit too much to theatrical convention in one or two places—are, as a whole, filled with grace and truthful human nature. The photography, without being absolutely perfect, is amply effective, and once or twice it reaches artistic beauties, as in the cave picture near the close with the big camp fire going. The expedient of throwing in at start and close of the pictures momentary glimpses of Broadway as it is to-day gives a weird punch to it that people will like—the effect on one's nerves is quite indescribable.

The plot brings the two young people together by making it necessary for the Governor of New Amsterdam to send a party to New England to buy corn. Indians attack and keep the Dutchmen from presenting themselves, Henry alone escaping, reaches the town as a refugee and dare not tell who he is. Priscilla is in trouble with her people, because she, an orphan, will not marry a son of a very forthputting matron, one Mistress Hibbens. The two lovers have plenty of adventures before they manage to get away from peril. It is a desirable feature offering.

"Lena Rivers"

Old-Time Story Done in Five Parts by the Cosmos Feature Film Corporation.

THOSE in search of good old-fashioned melodrama with a good admixture of coarse, bucolic, but not unwholesome humor, will find just this sort of thing in "Lena Rivers." The titular part is taken by Buelah Poynter. The part is a very thankful one and, though the distinguished actress is no longer in the first flush of youth, she acquitted herself on the whole with credit.

Like most melodramas, "Lena Rivers" is full of crudities and absurdities, but audiences who delight in melodrama are not the kind who incline to subject the rainbow to chemical analysis, hence we envy them for their simple-minded happiness.

The play is not without dramatic strength and at some points the interest was well worked up and well sustained. At other points the filmed version of the old play was altogether too diffuse and suffered from padding. A little cutting would strengthen the play and make the climaxes more telling and effective.

The outdoor settings were selected with commendable taste, but some of the interiors were somewhat below high standards. The photography was generally good. The acting was ordinary.

NEW HORSLEY STUDIO IN LOS ANGELES.

David Horsley has completed arrangements and placed contracts for the erection of a motion picture studio in Los Angeles, Cal. Ground was broken on Oct. 22, and the work, which is in charge of Wm. Horsley, will be carried on by night and day shifts, in an effort to have the main floors and lighting arrangements completed before the arrival of the three companies which Mr. Horsley will send out from the Centaur studios on the first of November.

Plans for the new coast studio have been ready for several weeks, but Mr. Horsley has had his eye on a location right in the heart of Los Angeles, which the owners for a long time refused to sell for motion picture purposes, and it was not until Friday, Oct. 16, that the transaction was finally closed. The Los Angeles studio will not be quite as capacious as the Bayonne plant, but will be a model producing establishment.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

SOME photoplay actors were teasing each other over their apparent lack of popularity with the public, as shown by the votes in a contest now being conducted by a leading newspaper, and the exchanges of half-hearted ridicule finally developed into a unanimous expression of serious thoughts regarding such contests which would indicate that competitions of that character are gradually losing their grip. In answer to a query as to why the contests were being criticised some of the players stated that it was because they are being usurped by individuals for personal advantage not contemplated by the promoters and bona fide contestants.

Upon being pressed for a definite statement, one of the players said "upon assurances that my name will not be used I will give you some truths which I am confident a large majority of the profession will recognize. I also want it understood that anything I may say must not be taken as a reflection either upon the publications that conduct such contests, or the bona fide contestants who figure in them. It is presumed that in such matters public sentiment prevails. By public sentiment I mean the opinion of that part of the public which patronizes motion picture shows and has become acquainted, through the screen, with relative merits of the several players. It is the opinion of many that a large—very large—proportion of the votes cast in the contests do not come from this source. I am one of the oldest performers in the photoplay business, so far as service is concerned, and I know that I am a favorite in many quarters; but my conscience would not permit me to aspire to the distinction of being the most popular player in the business. Some may say I am afraid of a test; others may charge me with pique, because my friends have not entered me in the contest of their own volition. It is immaterial to me which of these thoughts may prevail. The sole object of my statement is to endeavor to point out the evils that have developed in such contests

"All will agree that the main object of such competitions is to determine, so far as possible, who is the most popular bona fide photoplay actor or actress. It must also be conceded that players qualified for such contests are only those who are stock, or regular, performers. I claim that emergency people—those commonly known as 'extras'—are not qualified contestants and should not be matched against bona fide players in such competitions.

"When we wish to find the most popular photoplayer our first thought is in the direction of those who play leads and next important parts. We do not seek them in the offices that supply 'supers,' or in the ranks of the waiting 'extras' at studios. If a beauty contest was before the public I would waive the objection. I frankly admit that in such a competition there would be many prize-winners in the class I claim should be barred from the present contests."

When asked if he knew of his own knowledge of any one figuring in any of the present contests who is not a regular performer the player emphatically replied that he did. "I know of at least one who is an 'extra' of the most ordinary character, and yet that person's name appears prominently in one of the lists of most popular photoplayer contestants. I know the party well. I know that the party's chief field of employment is among the occasional groups that form attendants in scenes of social gatherings, theater audiences, mobs, etc., and at no time has the party been entrusted with a more serious, or distinct, part than an ordinary house servant—and a very ordinary one at that. Is it right that such people should be permitted to compete with professionals who owe what distinction they may have acquired upon the screen to merit born of many years of ardous effort and labor. The real players have a right to expect that some degree of dignity should be maintained in such contests."

When asked for suggestions whereby the competitions may be regulated so that unqualified contestants can be barred the player said one suggestion would suffice. Promoters of the contests should give notice that only regular players are eligible. As each entry is made the contestant should be required to furnish data showing qualification. During the contest the credentials could be investigated and any failing in confirmation should be taken as sufficient reason for dropping the contestants from the lists.

The player was reminded that should his objections prevail some honest and deserving individuals who have not been fortunate enough to secure recognition as regular players might be deprived of an opportunity of a life-time. Prominent positions at the close of the contests might place them in some sphere that might otherwise remain beyond their reach.

* * *

"That is a very charitable view to take of the matter," said the player, "and is a very proper one if such contests are to be regarded as an agency through which obscure players are to be boosted into prominence. But by what method of reasoning can such methods be endorsed with justice to the players who have really become popular with the amusement public? Unless such contests are regulated as I have suggested, I fear the real players will eventually decline to enter, and protest against any effort on behalf of their friends to make their names prominent in them. One of the most popular players on the screen who studiously avoids anything tending to make him appear 'up stage,' told me the other night he considered unrestricted contests a reflection upon the professional dignity of regular players. The results of such contests will neither make nor break the reputation of a regular player, but it is quite humiliating to find himself beaten in a contest by an ordinary 'extra' who wins—not by bona fide votes contributed by the public—but through the good fortune of having the support of an influential and liberal circle of friends. In such instances the spirit of fairness is wiped out. Public opinion is not expressed as the promoters of the contests and the public expect.

"I expressed my views plainly to a friend of one of the contestants whom I place in the unqualified class," said the player, "and he retorted that he could see no harm in 'extras' competing, particularly as there evidently was not the remotest chance of the party I referred to winning the contest. I could not agree with him and pointed out that the table of votes I had in mind showed that the party I had reference to was almost two thousand votes ahead of one of the most widely-known and popular players in this country. His reply was that it was the privilege of the player to get busy and roll up his score. For answer I could only say that I believed the player evidently considered it beneath his professional dignity to enter into such a competition. and I am quite positive that I correctly reflected the sentiment of that player.

"In all such contests," continued the player making the statement, "there should be the same spirit of honesty and fairness that is displayed in all straightforward public contests. People without the merit expected should not be permitted to crowd in upon the lists and divert the contest from its legitimate channels. There is every indication that recently some obscure people with ample personal backing have entered such contests for the sole purpose of getting their names as prominently as possible in the voting lists with the hope that the attention of producing companies may be attracted and some profitable engagement may result. In other words, a certain class of people are endeavoring to make such contests agencies for employment. This is objectionable for the reason that such people are not what the contests make them appear before the public. They are really building up a reputation on false pretense. This is the most serious aspect of the affair.

"I am at all times ready and willing to help any deserving player of merit, whether the player be a regular or so-called 'extra.' I know there are many of the latter who class in ability with some of the most prominent people on the screen, but I am unalterably opposed to that class of people who never have been, and never will be, recognized as bona fide performers and who are continually crowding into places where they do not belong and have neither the good taste nor intelligence to respect the rights and feelings of their superiors. There is no limit to their boldness and they will at any and all times violate the privacy of those above them in their mad and fruitless efforts to gain unwarranted recognition. I hope contest promoters will prepare themselves against such people in the future. Let the 'extras' have a contest of their own and not butt into places where they do not belong."

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"THE STRIKE AT COALDALE" (Eclair).

A railroad drama well done is always of great human interest, and "The Strike at Coaldale," a one-reel Eclair production, released Sunday, November 1st, is no exception to this rule.

The picture features Stanley Walpole and Mildred Bright and centers about a young engineer and the president of his railroad. Through a wonderful piece of bravery in driving a train across a burning trestle, the engineer wins the strike for the men and the hand of his employer's daughter. The film shows perfect direction and the strike is most realistic. A railroad trestle was actually burned for the making of this picture and cost the Eclair Company many hundreds of dollars.

"READY MONEY" (Lasky).

"Ready Money," the third Lasky picture, in which Edward Abeles makes his appearance, is to be the next release of that company through the Paramount Program, and the first showing of this production will also be the first scenes taken at the new Lasky reservation at the mouth of Wilson's Canyon, four miles beyond San Fernando, California. The new Lasky locale possesses all sorts of scenery, mountain peaks, valleys, streams, canyons, wooded hills, abandoned mines, ore dumps, coal tipples, crude miners' huts, an Indian camp of thirty-five tepees, a shallow lake, a small rivulet which runs for fifty feet and comes from a rocky nook and then, as though ashamed, disappears into a cavernous opening in the hillside, a mansion of old Colonial times and a sandy stretch of plain, are all on the new ranch, comprising four hundred acres, and extending over the San Fernando hills several miles is another thousand-acre stretch which the Lasky people have leased from the United States Government.

The mining scenes in "Ready Money" were made by Oscar Apefel on this latter stretch of ground, and the Lasky players were housed in one of the huge residential buildings containing twenty-four rooms and ample commissary connections.

"THE TURN OF THE TIDE" (Imp).

Just one of those simple, intensely human dramas with a real, true-to-life hero, a genuine villain and a heroine who will remind you of some girl you knew back home in the old days. The story was written and produced with no other purpose than just to please and entertain you. That it will succeed the doing this cannot be doubted. For one thing, King Baggot, the big and handsome "King of Hearts," does the role of the hero. And he does it with just that touch of manly strength which no other actor seems quite able to show. Arline Pretty, in the part of the heroine, is as pretty and refreshing as one could wish. Frank Smith plays the old father, a masterful character study. Geo. Lessey is the director.

It is a tale of the sea-coast and of fisher-people. You are the unobserved spectator. The atmosphere is of the kind which carries you away in the bonds of illusion. You see this fisher-boy, in his manly, honest way, win the heart of the "girl." Their romance is your romance. And when the boy is temporarily separated from the girl, as the result of another's villainy, you sympathize and feel that it is you who is being made to suffer. That is the way this drama has of getting to your heart-strings. When the big scene arrives—when our hero returns, the successful man, in time to rescue his old sweetheart from a pounding sea—the thrill which accompanies the spectacular feat is wholly yours to enjoy. Don't miss "The Turn of the Tide." The play is in two parts, and will be released as under the Imp brand, November 2d.

MAYOR MITCHELL SEES VITAGRAPH PICTURE.

At the Vitagraph theater, Broadway and 44th street, New York, Mayor Mitchell and a party of New York officials attended an exhibition Monday evening, Oct. 19, of the Vitagraph feature "The Locked Door." This picture was taken in collaboration with the New York Fire Department and is calculated to exert a strong educational influence upon the public in the matter of fire prevention. Mayor Mitchel and his associates were enthusiastic over the subject.

"THE WOLF'S DAUGHTER" (Lubin).

A very pathetic story which tells of the crooked operations of a mining stock broker, whose daughter is in love with one of his victims, a nephew of the Catholic bishop of the town. Many dramatic situations are pictured in the drama, the final one being the get-away of the swindler with $50,000 of the investors' money. The escape, however, is foiled by the daughter who restores the money to the people who have been robbed. The girl, feeling her disgrace and the loss of the man of her heart, finds peace in the convent as a nun. The atmosphere of the drama is typically Western. The scenes were taken in lower California by the director of the Lubin Los Angeles studio. An excellent cast has been selected, including Velma Whitman and L. C. Shumway, who are the leading players of Captain Melville's stock company.

Erker Brothers Optical Co.

Growth of Well-Known St. Louis Moving Picture Supply Business.

One of the oldest and largest motion picture supply houses in the country is the Erker Bros. Optical Company, of St. Louis. Not only does its stock consist of a large supply of Edison, Powers, Motiograph and Simplex machines, and all the separate machine parts, but also contains absolutely every article, large or small, that is needed in the motion picture theater, with the exception of film.

Many years ago when the exhibitor's paraphernalia consisted of an oil lantern and a few slides, Erkers' had a small space devoted to the display and sale of this line of goods. As the business advanced it grew up with the business, until now it has three floors of its up-to-date fireproof building devoted to the projection department.

The entire fifth floor is devoted to the making of slides. A skilled force of artists and photographers is kept busy turning out the regular daily orders and preparing copy for new stock designs.

If our readers ever get a chance to visit St. Louis they should not pass up the opportunity to make a visit to the up-to-the-minute supply house.

Its catalogues are issued from time to time and are worth-while lists for the office shelf of busy exhibitors.

United Theaters Company's Big Merger.

Louisville $100,000 Combine to Buy and Build Big Picture Houses—Incorporators Well Known in Louisville.

WHAT is said to be a step toward consolidation of numerous moving picture theaters is the organization in Louisville of the United Theaters Company, a hundred-thousand-dollar concern for which articles of incorporation have been prepared and will be filed shortly. A chain of theaters in Louisville and Jeffersonville is the immediate aim of the company, the Majestic, Casino and Orpheum houses being among those figuring in the merger. Incorporators of the new company will be Louis J. Dittmar, of the Majestic; Judge Allen Kinney, of the Princess Amusement Company, which operates the Casino and Orpheum houses, and W. B. Thomas, law partner of Judge Kinney. The same men are also interested in the Star Theater, which may be added to the combination. Of the capital stock $25,000 will be preferred and $75,000 common. The company will, it is said, acquire another theater in Louisville and will erect a house for pictures in Jeffersonville. It is further proposed to increase the capitalization to $500,000 when options on picture theaters in the state are available, although names of towns to be selected have not been made public. Where suitable theaters cannot be procured new ones will be erected, according to the promoters. The organization of the United Theaters Company is considered the first step in a general amalgamation of picture theaters in Kentucky, something well-posted managers declare is bound to come true eventually.

L. J. Dittmar, president of the Majestic Amusement Company, Louisville, has been considering opening a new theater at Third and Avery streets in that city, and one of the local architects has been making sketches for him. With the newer and larger idea of the United Theaters Company, however, it is hard to say whether the old plans will be carried out or not. Plans for remodeling a part of the Arcadia building at Fourth and Broadway for a motion picture house to seat 1,500 persons have been postponed for the time being.

ZOE THEATER IN HOUSTON, TEX., OPENS.

The Zoe Theater, in Houston, Tex., owned by John E. Davis, opened its doors to the public on Oct. 10, at five o'clock, with a World Film Corporation release, "America," which was made from the great spectacle shown on the immense stage of the New York Hippodrome, which was one of the greatest successes ever seen there. Among those who made speeches on this occasion were Mayor Ben Campbell, Rev. W. S. Jacobs, Rabbi W. Wilner and C. J. Kirk. The Zoe is to show all the World Film Corporation releases.

New Vitagraph Studio, Under Construction.

BENNED FILM COMPANY TO HANDLE FEATURES.

The Benned Film Company has opened offices at 110 West Fortieth street for the distribution of feature pictures in Greater New York. The firm is composed of Benjamin Weinberg and Edward Printz, the latter of whom is a New York exhibitor. The first release of the Benned will be a four-reel subject, "A Woman Who Did." This will be followed by "The Serpent of the Slums," three reels.

CONSTANCE CRAWLEY IN "THAIS."

Sawyer, Inc., has during the week closed contracts with Loftus Features, of Los Angeles, by which it will market all that company's products in the future. The new company features Constance Crawley and Arthur Maude. From the three pictures turned over to Sawyer it is evident that great attention is paid to detail, and that the director is a master in using outdoor settings. The company supporting Miss Crawley and Mr. Maude is adequate, and the costuming exceptionally fine.

The first of the Loftus Features will be released on Nov. 16, in a four-reel production from the opera "Thais." The Alexandrian charmer is played, of course, by Miss Crawley, while Mr. Maude is the priest whose ardent faith regenerates her, while at the same time he loses his own heart in love. The scenes depicting the Alexandrian revels are played with rare discretion, and while indicating the almost Bacchanalian splendor of the period there is no possibility of offensiveness in the films.

"The Fatal Night" is also in four reels, telling the story of St. Bartholomew's Eve, when Paris was drenched with the blood of the Huguenots. But from the doings of that night came a great happiness to at least one man and one woman—and that is the story that the pictures tell.

"The Virgin of the Rocks" is the third feature of the series, which will have early release through the Sawyer Film Mart.

LILIE LESLIE IN "MARAH."

To see a beautiful woman in the coils of an eight-foot python is something to shudder at, but this situation is pictured in a photoplay just released by the Lubin Company and entitled "Marah, the Pythoness.'" The story is woven around a woman who possesses the monster and appears to have charmed it into an affectionate docility. Miss Lilie Leslie, a Lubin leading lady, played the role apparently without fear and demonstrated a nerve that is rather unusual. As photography is perfectly truthful the picture will be a surprise and create a wonder as to what daring feat Miss Leslie will next accomplish.

JOHN BARRYMORE IN "MAN FROM MEXICO."

John Barrymore, irresistible, inimitable, who made his first appearance in motion pictures a few months ago, when he was starred in the Famous Players' comedy production, "An American Citizen," returns to the screen in a second Famous Players-Paramount release, H. A. Du Souchet's comedy triumph, "The Man from Mexico."

As was evidenced in his former film characterization, John Barrymore's greatest talent lies in the depiction of humorous dilemmas and farcical difficulties, and "The Man from Mexico" is crowded with this element of comedy. The situations are just the kind that afford the star ample and unlimited opportunities for the display of his droll mannerisms and delightful, mirth-provoking pranks.

"The Man from Mexico" has been recorded in theatrical history as one of the greatest comedies of the past two decades. The humorous incidents occur so rapidly that there is scarcely a pause of laughter throughout the entire production. In the film version the plot is greatly amplified, and many laughable situations that were only referred to in the original production are incorporated in the film, with the result that the motion picture adaptation surpasses the stage version in humor and appeal. The production, which is in five parts, will be released on the Paramount program November 2d.

MISS CLARK IN A LASKY PICTURE.

By arrangement entered into between Samuel Goldfish, general manager of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, and Adolph Zukor, of the Famous Players Film Company, dainty Marguerite Clark, best remembered from her recent dignified triumphs at the Little Theater, will appear in the Lasky production of the Liebler Company's famous dramatic success, "Merely Mary Ann."

Miss Clark is under contract with the Famous Players Film Company and appears with the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company in its forthcoming production through the courtesy of Mr. Zukor. Miss Clark, long considered the ideal ingenue type of purely American actress, while one of the youngest stars on the stage, boasts of a long line of successes.

NO VITAGRAPH PROPOSITION TO MRS. CARMAN.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Oct. 19, 1914.

Editor Moving Picture World,
New York City.

Dear Sir: In the New York Evening World, Friday, October 16, there appeared an article about Mrs. Edwin Carman and a statement from Dr. Edwin Carman that his wife had been offered a proposition from the Vitagraph Company to pose in a six-reel feature introducing the murder scene.

The Vitagraph Company wishes to state that it has never made any such proposition to anyone, and states most emphatically that it does not believe in such portrayals, and never has, nor ever will, desecrate the art of motion pictures to the level of morbid sensationalism.

Yours very truly,
THE VITAGRAPH COMPANY OF AMERICA.

Notes of the Trade

THE unique feature of a man standing face to face with himself and the two distinctly separate and yet identical characters carrying on a conversation can be seen in "The Private Officer," a photoplay released by the Essanay Company on October 23.

A corps of experienced miners, drillers and fire-control men were utilized by Director Frederick Sullivan when taking the explosion scene in "Zudora," Thanhouser's new serial. The title role played by Miss Marguerite Snow (Countess Olga of "The Million Dollar Mystery") gains name from a mine owned by Zudora's father and in which he meets his death, the result of a premature blasting charge. It was because of the great danger in taking this scene that trained fire-control men were employed.

Accompanied by a truck-load of paraphernalia and the physician who always goes with them on their trips from the studio grounds, the Gold Seal Company, under the direction of Wilfred Lucas, has left for San Gabriel Canyon in the heart of the Sierras, where are to be staged the greater part of the scenes in the fourteenth installment of "Trey o' Hearts" series.

A private exhibition of "Salomy Jane," the Alco release from the studio of the California Motion Picture Corporation, was given in the releasing corporation's projection room last week. Many prominent film men expressed admiration as the scenes of the Bret Harte romance were spread before them. Particularly were the directors of the California organization pleased, for the projection meant the end of two years' work in California.

Francis X. Bushman, Essanay's leading man, has been left a fortune of $25,000. The widow of Marshall Bushman, of Death Valley, called at the Essanay plant to see the actor. She said her husband, just before his death, recently, had seen a moving picture show in which Bushman was starring. He declared the actor was his cousin whom he had not seen since childhood. Mrs. Marshall Bushman has gone to the actor's home in Norfolk, Va., to trace the relationship.

The reviewers are sighing quite some sighs of relief. They have found the projection room de luxe, situated and lying no farther from Broadway than No. 126 West 46th street, where the Kinetophote has just introduced a goodly number of them to about forty or more luxurious willow chairs in which to lounge while viewing Kinetophote features. There seems to be a general spirit of acclaim that such is so.

Great activity is in evidence at the Eastern scenario offices of the Universal. Several competent men and women have been taken on and the books of many of the celebrated writers of present-day fiction are being carefully gone over, it being Editor George Hall's plan to choose some of the best to be adapted to motion pictures.

Jay Hunt has contributed an admirable piece of character acting in "The Mills of the Gods," a new Ince production treating of peasant life in Holland. Mr. Hunt portrays the part of an old Dutch miser, whose wife dies by reason of his narrow theories about money. Others in the cast are Margaret Thompson and J. Barney Sherry.

Within the next two weeks, the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company will release the third of the Edward Abeles photoplays with the famous comedian in roles aptly suited to his peculiar comedy abilities, when James Montgomery's highly interesting play, "Ready Money," is seen on the screen November 5. "Ready Money," although a purely American play, enjoyed success in seven different languages at one time.

Lionel Barrymore, who is starring in a coming production of the Kinetophote, "The Span of Life," says that playing in "The Span" is a rather novel experience, in that he remembers being taken to see the stage production of the piece at either the Twenty-third Street Theater or the Fourteenth Street Theater when he was in short pants. How long ago that was, deponent saith not.

The Oz Film Manufacturing Company recently gave a private exhibition of "His Majesty, the Scarecrow of Oz," in the auditorium of the Los Angeles Athletic Club. Over thirty-five hundred people attended and enjoyed every foot of the photo extravaganza. The opinion seems to be that in this second picture the Oz Company has turned out a picture far superior to the "Patchwork Girl of Oz," which is at present playing with such tremendous success throughout the country.

Margaret Thompson, ingenue at Inceville, has won the plaudits of her associates by her splendid work in "Rumpelstiltskin," an elaborate four-part fairy story that has just been produced under the direction of Raymond B. West. Miss Thompson appears as the good fairy and her interpretation of the role is declared to be unequalled.

Harry Edwards has just finished a split-reel comedy in which the only characters are two cats, a rat and a kitten. The title of the picture is "The Tale of a Kitten" and it took just six thousand five hundred feet of film for Mr. Edwards to catch the requisite number of scenes to make up six hundred feet of finished product.

A novel scene in "The City of Darkness," Thomas H. Ince's virile drama of crime, politics and love, is that depicting the death chamber in a state's prison. The setting has been so arranged as to give a comprehensive idea of the equipment of the grewsome room and nothing has been left undone to present every detail. Even the electric chair is shown with all its deadly apparatus.

Mr. Charles Hayden has recently joined the forces of the Oz Film Manufacturing Company at their studios at Hollywood. Mr. Hayden was with Brady in the original of "A Stranger in a Strange Land" and played a great many of Brady's attractions. He will visit in turn all of the corporation's Western exchanges, while Mr. Lichtman visits the Eastern organizations, returning to New York at frequent intervals.

An attractive feature of "The Mills of the Gods"—an unusual Ince production, soon to be released by the New York Motion Picture Corporation—is a genuine Dutch wind-mill. The mill was constructed expressly for the purpose of making it one of the realistic factors in the story and is an exact reproduction of the historic mills in old Holland.

Nat I. Brown has just returned from a Southern trip in the interests of the Alco Film Corporation. He travelled through North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia, Alabama and Florida, and was gone three weeks. "In the Glare of the Lights," the Essanay drama of the steel mill, recently released, combines spectacular settings with powerful acting. Francis X. Refusing to leave any word as to her whereabouts, or telephone number, and with a muttered something about "a beach, fresh milk to drink, daily dips in the briny deep, long walks and hours of long, undisturbed sleep," Ruth Ann Baldwin, one of the Universal's talented force of scenario writers, has left the West Coast studios for her vacation.

Mothers' day at the Empress Theater, Spokane, Wash., brought 315 mothers with babes in their arms, to see the World Film Corporation photoplay, "Mother." Manager Sam Cohn admitted all mothers free, who came with their babies. Pandemonium reigned in the theater when the 315 little cherubs broke forth into gurgling, cooing, squalling, laughing, and they kept it up all that afternoon. In the lobby 49 baby carriages, go-carts and perambulators were lined up waiting their infantile occupants.

Dustin Farnum, who has played the leading role in two Lasky productions, "The Squaw Man" and "The Virginian," left New York for Hollywood, Cal., this week, where he will again become active at the Lasky studios in the film version of the Liebler Company's stage success, "Cameo Kirby," in which Mr. Farnum played during its legitimate popularity.

Howard Estabrook has been engaged to play the lead of "Travers Gladwin," in George Kleine's film version of the famous Cohan & Harris success, "Officer 666." He will be ably supported by a cast which includes Della Connor, Ada Alvil, Lois Burnett, Sidney Seaward, Dan Moyles and Ino Kushi.

J. Frank Burke is afforded an excellent chance to depict a calloused-hearted father in "The Hateful God," a new Ince production. Mr. Burke is given the splendid support of Enid Markey.

The court-room scene in "Zudora," Thanhouser's new serial, by Daniel Carson Goodman, was taken in the historic building which now serves New Rochelle as a city hall. Some of the most famous orators of a bygone day have declaimed within those musty old walls. Director Frederick Sullivan has carried on to the screen that attitude of mingled awe and expectancy, which is typical of a court-room throng.

Margaret Thompson, leading woman at Inceville, is to be seen to advantage in "The Mills of the Gods," a strong story of peasant life in Holland that will be released by Thomas H. Ince's New York Motion Picture Corporation. Miss Thompson handles the part of a sweet little maid of the dikes with a commingling of humor and pathos that is not commonly seen.

"European Armies in Action," the four-part Kleine war film, was held up as an example to emulate in the subtitling of similar pictures, by the mayor and chief of police of Seattle, Wash., last week. Interesting Information Concerning Moving Picture Men Gathered By Moving Picture World Correspondents Everywhere.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE coming of cooler weather has done much to speed up the sale of tickets in the motion picture houses of Washington and on Saturday night, October 17, the exhibitors experienced the largest box office receipts seen in months. It would have been a hard matter to find a house that had not had them standing clear out to the curb at some time or other during the evening, and as a result the World correspondent was everywhere greeted with the smile that wouldn't come off, and was invited in to see the mob. Having had a first-hand knowledge of the "standing-room-only" view of the show, he very wisely declined.

In the announcement that some of the exchanges will no longer be able to obtain ten-cents-a-foot reels, and that exhibitors will have to see about increasing their prices for admission, there is much food for reflection. The exhibitors of Washington, without a doubt, are giving far too much for five cents. "There is a man in this town," said an enterprising exhibitor, "who is givin~ up to ei~ht reels for five cents and is jollying himself into believing that he is making money just because he happens to own the ground and the theater in which he is exhibiting, and his capacity is less than 400. Such a man as this is really a menace to the good conduct of the business as a whole—he needs a little education in the art of making money. There is no one house in town that ever will be able to corral all of the moving picture fans at any stated period, and the sooner that some of the exhibitors become convinced of this fact, and give the other fellows a little more opportunity of getting in the nickels, the better off all of us will be. The man who gives four reels for five cents, keeps his shows and his house clean, and does not try to keep his audience penned up in his theater all evening while he tries to keep his competitors from getting any of their patronage, will not only ~ain the confidence of his patrons, but will rise in the esteem of his fellow-exhibitors. I am in favor of the setting of ten cents as a standard of admission all through the city. With increased expenses all along the line, this is bound to come."

Harry Crandall is meeting marked success with his matinees for women shoppers, and not only that, but he is getting a good share of the male patronage. He has refurnished his theater so as to make it a most attractive place for the ladies to use as a sort of resting place after a round of the downtown department stores. The aisles have been carpeted and portieres have been hung near the doorways; the ushers are in evening dress, and added to all of this comes the announcement that this will be the first theater in Washington to house a Bartola electrical orchestra of one of the largest designs. This instrument is designed to produce the effect of a sixteen-piece orchestra, and can be used for solo purposes or as a pipe organ, and the various pieces separately or in groups. He has also secured the services of an expert organist for its operation and is in hopes of being able to give a demonstration of the new acquisition to the actors and actresses who will visit Washington to participate in the ball on October 31. The instrument will weigh two tons and it is expected that it will prove to be a great attraction.

J. E. Osmet, of the Fairfax theater, Culpepper, Va., was a visitor in Washington last week.

Finishing touches are being given to Penn Gardens, an amusement park soon to be opened by E. K. Fox, at the corner of Twenty-first and Eye streets, Northwest, at the intersection of Pennsylvania avenue. The gardens are to include an open-air picture park, with a seating capacity approximating 1,600 persons, and an inclosed house with a seating capacity of about 500. The gardens will have a frontage on Eye street of 124 feet and 157 feet on Twenty-first street. The inclosed auditorium measures 40 feet by 123 feet, while the airdome will be 104 feet wide and 117 feet long. The decoration of the exterior will be very elaborate and has been given a pebble-dash finish. Within the park, space has been provided for refreshment and other concessions.

Pneumonia was the cause of his death. Mr. Pitman was a graduate from Yale. He retired from the United States Postal Service several years ago and opened the Royal theater, at East street, North Side, Pittsburgh, Pa., where he has made a big success as a motion picture exhibitor. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association expressed their sorrow by sending a large floral design to the deceased.

Moving pictures of the human heart will soon be shown at the University of Pittsburgh through the medium of the electro-cardiagraph, which has been obtained by Dr. James D. Heard, professor of medicine. With Dr. Heard in Europe recently was Dr. A. P. D'Zmura, the recently appointed Mellon research fellow, who was sent abroad by the university for instruction in the use of the instrument. The principle upon which the usefulness of the new instrument depends is that electric currents are generated during the contraction of a muscle and are thrown upon a moving photographic plate. The instrument also is of value in studying the physiology of the heart and the effects of various forms of treatment.

CHURCH.

NEBRASKA.

WHEN a petition was circulated in St. Paul asking that the Star theater be prohibited from operating its moving picture show on Sunday, the argument was advanced that it kept the people from church. The editor of the Republican ridicules this idea. He says that if that theory is going to govern it would be advisable at once to pass a law prohibiting owners of automobiles from driving their cars on Sunday. Furthermore, he believes that those who patronize Sunday picture shows would not attend church, even if the theater was not operated.

The new proprietor marked his advent by inviting suggestions from the public. Burr Swan of Pittsfield had a cameraman in that town for the big Fall Festival and celebration. He did this in his capacity as manager of the K. P. Opera House picture show and as editor and proprietor of the Pike County Republican. He will preserve the films. He planned a 500-foot reel and got off easy by letting it run nearly a thousand. As usual he took the whole town into his confidence. "What does it cost to take a moving picture? Well, Bernadine, every foot of moving picture that flashes across the screen costs not less than twenty cents, provided the cameraman doesn't have any bad luck at all. Which is to say that the cameraman will receive between $15 and $20 for every minute that he turns the crank. * * * Yep, it does come high but who wouldn't give a measly $150 for a five hundred foot picture of a big bunch of the finest people under the shining sun. The old man would, and he's going to have a moving picture of the Big Free Fall Festival and Home Coming all for his very own, just to keep, like a plush album of old-fashioned photos that rests on the center table in the parlor." The Bon Feature Company did the work.

KANSAS.

FRED SAVAGE, manager of the De Luxe and Iris theaters at Hutchinson, Kan., has found it doesn't pay to fight the Sunday closing order; but instead has found that it is very profitable to co-operate with it. Mr. Savage let it be known that he believed it was right to close on Sunday, and the newspapers spread the fact broadcast, the result being that all the ministers in the city were applauding his action. Now Mr. Savage says that the people come from Wednesday night prayer meeting to attend his show, and he has secured practically all the church members as permanent patrons.

The Mystic theater, recently finished in Pittsburg, Kan., will open October 15. The theater is modern in every respect and seats about 1,400. The interior decorations are very fine, and the lobby is one of the finest in the state. It will be managed by the Ryan Brothers.

Walter Bell, a cameraman, has recently returned to Kansas City after spending a very successful season with the Kansas Motion Picture Company. During the summer he has taken over 35,000 feet of film, and he shows some very interesting letters given him by merchants who were well pleased with his work. He expects to spend the winter in Kansas City, and it is possible that he may connect himself with one of the exchanges here.

T. M. Magruder has sold the Star theater at Yates Center, Kan., and has purchased the Gem theater in Perry, Okla. Mr. Magruder will move with his family to Perry in a short time.

Wm. Meyn, manager of the Phototorium theater in Kansas City, Kan., has recently returned from Europe, and has many interesting stories "on tap." He says that when he first left Berlin every thing was quiet, and the people were all peaceful, but when he got to London there were dispatches up that said that the people of Berlin were in rebellion. He said this was absolutely false.

BROWN.

CINCINNATI

ONE of the most daring aviators in that hazardous business, judging from flights made over and around Cincinnati last week, is Arthur Smith, a 20-year-old youngster who is working under the instruction of Harry Atwood. Smith on one occasion made sixteen consecutive loops over the city, which is said to be a world's record for that particular form of breakneck foolhardiness. One of the most spectacular flights which he made was immediately over the business section of the city, when he circled several times around the towering Union Central building, passing very close to those on the observation gallery of the skyscraper; and on this occasion some extremely unusual and interesting moving pictures were taken, which were shown shortly after by Mr. Atwood, in connection with a lecture given by him at the Automobile Show. The pictures were really remarkable, showing the various evolutions of the aviator in detail, and enabling Mr. Atwood to explain fully to a big audience the technique of the dangerous loop.

Another picture of more than ordinary interest shown at the Cincinnati Automobile Show, which drew heavily last week, in spite of the widespread talk of business depression, was the three-reel industrial and civic film which has been prepared under the direction of the Chamber of Commerce, showing views of leading industrial concerns around the city, as well as of points of beauty and interest. It bears the significant title of "Beautiful, Busy Cincinnati," and prints of it are among those which are to be shown in South America, to give the inhabitants of that part of the world a graphic idea of the things seen and done in the United States.

Cincinnati houses are now generally running a slide requesting women to remove their hats, "in compliance with the state law," as it specifically sets forth. The law is a new one, and has not been generally invoked, but the failure of a large proportion of women patrons of the theaters to remove their hats resulted in a general determination here and elsewhere to see that it was complied with. In a number of instances belligerent women who objected to removing their hats had to be forcibly assured that the law really required it; but they are now obeying with something like good grace, much to the relief of the "mere men" in photoplay audiences. The Lubin has for some time run a slide about to this effect: "On account of the length of the performance, we feel justified in asking ladies to remove their hats," which is a reasonable and courteous way to put it, as the house runs only big attractions, from five to seven reels.

Manager Hetteberg, of the Electic Film Company's Cincinnati office, had a distinguished visitor last week in the person of W. R. Scates, district manager for the company. He was formerly manager of the General Film Company's Chicago and Boston offices, and is well known among exhibitors here and elsewhere. He spent several days with Manager Hetteberg going over the general situation.

The Cincy, one of the several prosperous houses in the vicinity of Peebles' Corner, one of the busiest suburban points in Cincinnati, has passed to the exclusive control of L. P. Stamm, following the dissolution of the partnership heretofore existing between Mr. Stamm and W. Palmer, who have operated the house for some time.

A new and apparently effective member of the selling force of the World Film Company's office in Cincinnati is Henry P. Rhinock, brother of Joseph Rhinock, formerly of Covington, Ky., once a Kentucky Congressman and largely interested in the Latonia race track, but now one of the leading spirits in the Shubert Company, of which he is secretary. Henry P. Rhinock came to Cincinnati from New York last week to join the World force, and has already closed a number of important contracts with exhibitors for the use of Shubert-Brady service. CASEY.

MISSOURI.

He takes the place of Joe Gilday, who has been appointed booker for the Standard Amusement Company, and of the Lappe-Tighe Amusement Company.

The McClure brothers have purchased the Comique theater at Jamesport, Mo. It was opened October 12 with a Mutual program.

The new Hippodrome at Springfield, Mo., will open October 18. The theater is owned by E. E. Parnell, operating under the name of the Hippodrome Amusement Company. It is probably the largest theater in the state outside of Kansas City and St. Louis, and will seat about 22,000. It will show pictures and put on an occasional road show.

A. D. Flinton, president of the Kansas City Features Company, which is handling the Paramount service for this territory, says that the success of that service has been far greater than was expected and that the company is adding new accounts every day.

KENTUCKY.

WEATHER conditions in Louisville for the past week or ten days have been excellent and the local photoplay houses have been drawing good crowds. Several high grade features have been exhibited and the public is very much interested in several large serial productions which have been running for some weeks. The "Million Dollar Mystery" has drawn well from the start in the various houses in which it is shown and, strange to say, the crowds have gained instead of diminished. It is to be expected that persons who have missed one or two shows would stay away thereafter, but the reverse is working out. People who have kept up with the play and the newspaper story tell their friends, and houses which at first were drawing a mediocre attendance are now selling standing room only.

W. L. LeCompte, manager of the Owl Feature Film Company, Louisville, was in Chicago for a few days recently. Mr. LeCompte has been out of the city a considerable part of his time of late buying films and equipment. Business with the concern is excellent and trade from out in the state is coming in well.

The National theater in Louisville, which was taken over a few months ago by the Keith Circuit, opened its house last week after postponing the opening for a full week. The acoustics have been improved and are now said to be perfect, and it is now possible to hear from any seat in the house, in spite of the size of the structure. Keystone comedies are being run every week as a part of the regular bill.

J. I. Schnitzer, general manager of the Central Film Service Company's Indianapolis office, was in Louisville last week looking over conditions.

The new Cherokee theater, Louisville, which has been under course of construction for several months, is about completed and will be opened shortly. This theater is located on the Bardstown road in a very good residential neighborhood and considerable difficulty was experienced in getting a building permit as the neighbors were opposed to it operating on Sunday or showing any vaudeville turns. The theater is elaborately built and is one of the finest suburban theaters in the South. The house will open with the Universal program.

The Parkland theater, Louisville, which was built and first operated by a stock company, of which Ex-Governor Thatcher, of Panama, was head, has been leased to E. G. Floyd, who has made arrangements to run the house on Sunday. As a six day a week proposition the theater was not successful.

The S. & P. Film Supply Company of Louisville has purchased a bale of cotton which will be displayed in the Green street window in an effort to help the "Buy-a-Bale" movement in Louisville. The cotton market situation is having very little effect on local theaters or on motion picture houses in the South, but it is playing the Dickens with a number of the large legitimate houses of the South.

E. O. McGaugil, who operates a motion picture house at Mt. Eden, Ky., was in the city recently purchasing supplies for his house. Among other exhibitors to visit the city were P. H. Glenn of LaFollette, Tenn.; J. P. Masters, manager of the Crescent Amusement Company's new house at Bowling Green, Ky., and Mr. Faith of Elizabeth, Ind.

Dr. Herndon, of Pineville, Ky., who operates a picture show for the Straight Creek Coal Company at Straight Creek, near Pineville, Ky., was in Louisville recently looking for supplies and film service. This theater is one of a number which have been started in the past few months by large coal and lumber concerns operating in isolated districts.

It is reported that a new motion picture house is to be established shortly at Shelby and Rupp streets, Louisville. No definite information can be secured on the matter at this time.

The Knickerbocker Theater Company was recently incorporated in Louisville. The capital stock of the company is listed at $5,000, and the incorporators are C. W. Barnes, C. R. Smith and J. L. Duncan.

"Army Life," a film recently made by the promoters of the Bluegrass Moving Picture Company, before that concern was incorporated, is being booked with success by the S. & P. Film Supply Company of Louisville throughout the state. This picture is one showing the First Kentucky Regiment in camp at Fort Nelson, Ky., and is a local interest affair. Comedy and Western pictures are in strong demand and it is hard to keep a supply of popular films on hand. Charley Pressy, one of the officers of the company, has just returned from a trip through the West. He purchased a quantity of films in some of the larger cities. Business in the grain-growing districts of Kentucky, Indiana and other nearby states has been excellent, he reports.

Preferred stock to the amount of $90,000 was issued recently by the National Theater Company, Louisville, to cover improvements in the theater building which is now the Keith house, and for other obligations. The amended articles have been filed and the stock issued. This stock was authorized under the original articles, but had never been issued, it is stated. The amended articles were signed by David King, president; Joseph Selligman and Fred Levy. The new stock is divided into 9,000 shares of the par value of $10 each.

Nothing further has been done on the project of opening a new house on Second street, near Burnett avenue, Louisville, which the Broadway Amusement Company had up. This house was to seat 1,200 persons and was in the center of a very fine residential district. It is understood that considerable objection was raised by the residents of the neighborhood to putting in the picture theater and that the plans have been dropped. J. D. CRAIN, JR.

PHILADELPHIA.

THE status of motion picture players will probably be one of the puzzling features to be taken up by the next Pennsylvania legislature which meets in January and which will consider the workmen's compensation act defeated last year. By a resolution adopted at the last session the constitution of the state has been so changed as to permit the passage of such a law.

A Powers 5 and a Powers 6 A projector are on display in the window of Louis M. Swaab, 1327 Vine street, and show the various movements in action. The exhibition is attracting considerable attention from exhibitors.

The Coliseum at 5917 Market street is closed for several weeks pending interior alterations. Work will also be done on the outside, but most attention will be devoted to the interior which will represent the highest art in interior decorating.

The Eastern Booking Exchange has issued complimentary tickets to exhibitors to view "Ireland, a Nation," shown all week at the Chestnut Street Opera House.

William Goetz, manager of the Fulton theatre, North Bergen, Pa., lost a valuable diamond pin recently, but had it returned in a peculiar way. A brakeman found it and took it to a local jeweler to have it appraised. The jeweler recognized it as having been sold to Mr. Goetz, and returned it to him.

The Blue Bird, North Philadelphia's newest theater, located at Broad street and Susquehanna avenue, has been completed. The initial offering was the "Man of the Hour." The first show was given on October 16.

SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST

MANAGER FLYNN has opened the new Iris theater at Douglas, Ariz.

The Rebuilt Bijou Dream theater, St. Charles street, near Canal, in New Orleans, La., will be ready for business about the middle of November, according to J. E. Pearce, general manager of Josiah Pearce & Sons, which company is reconstructing the house. The architect's design is for one of the most pretentious houses in the South. The front on St. Charles street will have four handsome marble columns. Inside there will be a mahogany wainscoting eleven feet high, fancy stone on the walls and ceiling and an arch effect to add to the general attractiveness. The capacity of the house will be doubled by the improvements.

Pearce's theater at Houston, Tex., is going in for all the alliteration possible. Witness the line, "Paramount Pictures Peerlessly Projected."

T. P. McDonald, formerly of Greenville, Tex., has sold his theater at Cooper, Tex.

Beginning October 4 the Folly theater at Oklahoma City, Okla., went over to a new policy of running continuous moving pictures and vaudeville from noon until 11 p. m. Five acts of vaudeville, five reels of pictures and Finley's orchestra make up the programs. The pictures are changed daily.

The Savoy theater at Shawnee, Okla., announced that beginning October 15 it would present two acts of vaudeville in addition to its picture programs.

The Odeon at Shawnee, Okla., publishes a weekly program in the newspapers. Patrons are urged to keep it for reference but in order to enjoy themselves thoroughly are advised to "make every day Odeon Day."

J. S. McIntyre and L. N. Cox, the new proprietors of the Majestic theater at Ardmore, Okla., have proclaimed that they are pleased at the first week's business, and assure the public that the top-notch stuff in motion pictures will be shown on their screen.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

DETROIT.

THE slightest anticipations of Manager Howard Pierce of the Washington as regards business during Mary Pickford week were exceeded. Mr. Pierce knew, of course, from his former experience at the Liberty that Mary Pickford was very popular and that any picture with her name attached to meant a big drawing card. But when he decided to show three Mary Pickford pictures in one week, all of which had previously been shown in Detroit, he did not believe that there would be any astonishing business. However, he was mistaken as the Washington broke all house records for attendance. From the very minute that the theater was opened in the afternoon until the last picture shown at night the Washington held good crowds, and most of the time the house was packed.

The report is current that T. D. Moule, manager of the Liberty, will be transferred to the new Alhambra theater at Woodward and Kenilworth when that house is opened early in November, and that Mr. Irons, now in charge of the Royal, will succeed Mr. Moule at the Liberty. Mr. Moule, previous to his position at the Liberty, was manager of the Columbia, and also managed the Garden theater. He came to Detroit last February from New York, where he was associated with the Kinemacolor company. The Liberty theater is adding thirty seats upstairs. While the Liberty has no balcony, Mr. Moule has had the size of his office, which is one flight up, cut down, and the space used in which to put seats. The partition has been taken out and a railing put across. These seats will sell for 15 cents and will be used only when the downstairs seats are sold. "It will save at least thirty people from standing outside," said Mr. Moule. "If we can fill them four or five times a day, it will amount up to something in the course of a year."

Charles Burton opened a theater at Grand River avenue and the Boulevard October 3. It is absolutely new throughout and a very handsome playhouse. No name has yet been selected. Mr. Burton sometime ago started a contest for names, offering $25 for the best name. It is likely that the house will be called "The Mary Pickford," owing to the popularity of this young lady and the fact that it makes an ideal name for a moving picture theater. Quite a number of people have suggested this name.

The lease of the building in which the Woodward theater is located, on Woodward avenue near the Campus, has been sold to A. M. Barnes, retail merchant, who plans in the course of another year or two to tear down the present structure and erect a new building exclusively for mercantile purposes.

The Woodward theater is throwing a slide on the screen after each show to the effect that the management wants scenarios and that it will pay for them. The scenarios accepted will be used in the production of films which will be made by a Detroit company.

In the bulletin for the week of October 11 issued by the Liberty theater, there is contained the following article, headed with the caption "About Ourselves:" "So many inquiries are made, 'What makes the pictures at the Liberty so clear and steady?' that we believe a word of explanation will be appreciated by our patrons. The greatest reason, of course, is the fact that we use the productions of none but the best producers, whose output is the result of years of study and is in the hands of the most efficient artists that money can secure. Our mechanical equipment, in charge of two professional operators, Messrs. Brunell and Williams, is the best and latest devised for the projection of motion pictures. Our screen or 'picture sheet' is the famous and costly Radium Gold Fibre screen, installed with several ideas of our own and masked with curtains of solid black draperies which exclude any stray rays of outside light, the whole equipment producing what can well be called perfection."

Howard Pierce, manager of the Washington, has been accepted as a member of the Rotary Club. This club is composed of one man from each line of trade. The members meet for a noonday lunch, followed by short discussions, every Wednesday. The club will have permanent quarters in the New Hotel Statler, which will open New Year's Day.

J. H. McCarron, manager of the Family theater, and a baseball fan by nature, is wearing the "broad smile" owing to the victory of the Boston Braves over the Philadelphia Athletics. "Mac" was formerly a Bostonian, and of course, his sympathies during the world's baseball series were with that team. For some weeks past he has been telling his friends that the Braves would lead the National League and would also win the world's pennant, but nobody took him seriously until after they had won the third game from Philadelphia.

Harry Goldberg, sales manager of the Casino Feature Film Company, went to New York October 10, combining business with pleasure. It was a sort of vacation for Harry, who has been working continuously all summer.

A Hillgreene-Lane organ has been installed in the Washington theater. It has twenty-eight stops, chimes and a Voxhumana attachment. It will be in operation by the first of November. The management plans to give half hour recitals prior to the beginning of the afternoon and evening performances.

Since October 1 the union scale for motion picture operators was increased from $17 to $20 in the theaters running double shifts of seven hours to the shift. The scale for assistants is $14 per week.

October 12 the New Empire showed "The Naked Truth." Manager Starr states it broke all house records.

A. J. Gillingham, of the General Film Company, attended the opening of the New Schenley theater in Pittsburgh, October 12. This theater is operated by the Harris Amusement Company.

The Board of Commerce will be permitted to use a motion picture machine in its building for the special entertainment planned for November 3. Deputy State Fire Marshall H. P. Orr issued the permit. At first he refused to do this, saying that it was a violation of the law, which forbids motion picture entertainments on second floors. A special permit on each occasion is necessary. However, the deputy ruled finally that inasmuch as the entertainment on November 3 is for Board of Commerce members only, it is not a public gathering and the use of the moving picture machine is therefore permissible.

Fuller Clafflin has let for the Grand Boulevard Theater Company the general contract on their brick and stone theater on the East Grand boulevard, near Woodward, to the Schmied-Sisman Company.

Detroit's marine mail service, generally conceded to be the most dangerous method of delivering mail in this country, is to be shown to Detroiters on the screens before the end of October. The pictures taken recently are to be shown at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, but citizens of Detroit will have an opportunity of seeing them first. A reel will be sent to Postmaster William J. Nagel this month. Any charitable organization, the Board of Commerce or any other body of men, will be furnished with the reel free of charge. The pictures were shown on the screen of the Liberty theater one night after the house closed its regular performance.

Wilbur W. Langtry, representing the District of Columbia Paper Manufacturing Company, of Washington, D. C., who is on a tour giving an illustrated talk on paper-making, using both slides and films, will be in Detroit in the near future. The purpose of the trip is to give printers and other users of paper a better idea of its manufacture.

An addition costing $1,000 is to be made to the theater of Fred Rumler's at 118 West Warren avenue.

Edward Selden, temporary manager of the Detroit branch of the World Film Corporation, says a big change has come about in the moving picture industry in the past year. "Business men are now interested in the moving picture industry. It isn't so much a case of knowing the technical part of the business as much as it is being a practical business man. The industry is getting down to a business basis and the films are being sold on businesslike principles, the same as other mercantile lines. The weak men are being weeded out and their places being taken by real business men with brains and ability. To get at the truth of this argument, just compare the class of men interested in this business as compared with three or five years ago."

The Board of Health has started a campaign for better ventilation in the moving picture booths and by degrees it is eliminating the "stuff box" type of operating room. SMITH.

INDIANA.

OTTO MOORE, manager of the Grand Central, Indianapolis, has changed his program from three to five reels without any change in the price, which is 5c.

R. O. Allen has bought the Royal theater, one of the Indianapolis downtown houses, from the receiver. The house is only a few steps from Illinois street, one of the city's heaviest traveled streets. Mr. Allen does not believe that he will have any trouble making the house turn a profit.

The American Theater Film Company, in charge of I. Bietman, has opened offices at 418 Saks Building, Indianapolis. The company also has offices in Cleveland and Toledo, Ohio. Mr. Bietman is offering a number of films for which he has found ready booking in Indianapolis.

The church forces of the town are carrying the decision up. Meantime the other theaters in Muncie will open.

A very beautiful and unusual electric sign over the new Lindell theater at Grand avenue and Hebert street attracts much attention from the passers-by in that neighborhood. Citizens of Hayward did not come to the aid of the school board in their plan to raise a fund for the purchase of a machine, and it was decided to seek the co-operation of Manager H. E. Ernst of the local moving picture theater. It was decided to secure the films and slides from the university extension bureau, charge a small admission to the townspeople and offer Manager Ernst a rental fee or a per cent. of the receipts. This is the song of the management of the opera house picture show at Athens: "Next to music there is nothing that has as much influence over humanity as pictures; they leave their impressions upon the brain—the intellect—for good or bad. No bad pictures are ever shown at the opera house picture shows, hence their influence on the brain is always for the best. They gladden the heart, they dispel the blues and tend to soften the nature that has a tendency to grow hard from being wrapped up too closely with its own troubles and hardships. LICENSED FILM STORIES

EDISON.

THE NEW PARTNER (Nov. 2).—Elizabeth Marsh had just arrived from Europe when she received a call from Burns and Hyde, accompanied by Farley. They presented a document, connected with the factory a half interest in which she had just inherited, and asked her to sign it. Having no special interest in the matter, she quickly complied, not knowing that she was working into the hands of schemers by signing a petition against any change being made in the existing factory regulations, which compelled the hands to work ten hours. That same night, the committee of three called on the other owner, Philip Barton, and secured his signature to a similar document. Though co-partners, neither of the young people know each other.

That very same night, having learned of the arrival of Miss Marsh, Maggie Murphy decided to make an effort to see the young lady and tell her of the troubles that the factory hands had to contend with. Bravely she made her way to the house, and having gained an interview, she told such an interesting story that Miss Marsh decided to go to the child's home. The conditions of poverty which she found there, and the additional stories she heard, caused her to come to a grave decision. Disguising herself in poor clothes, she applied for employment in her own factory, posing as a cousin of the Murphy family.

In the midst of her first day, visitors were suddenly announced, and there was a wild scramble to get the small children out of sight. Barton decided to inspect his factory, and while he was making the rounds a fire broke out. Thanks to him, the women and children were rescued, he even returning into the burning building to carry out crippled Tim and afterwards to carry out Miss Marsh, who was disguising her real name and identity, under the assumed name of Lizzie Murphy.

After the fire, Barton searched high and low for her, without success. Realizing the genuine ills of the factory workers, Miss Marsh decided to make real changes and started in by giving them a lawn party. As Barton was there, she slipped on the old factory clothes over her dress, and allowed him to discover her. When Hyde and Burns appeared on the scene, however, they were informed that an entirely new plan had been evolved, and that the factory in future would be managed by the partners personally.

SHORTY (Nov. 3).—Not having a proper home to go to, Shorty became a member of Dago Pete's gang of wharf rats, and when the news appeared that a shipment of diamonds was to be made on Captain Arnold's boat, Pete decided to ship his men as the crew and make an effort to steal the gems. Ethel Arnold happened to be with her father when he was shipping the men. Her intercession caused Shorty to be chosen. The girl's attention came as a surprise to the boy and served to awaken his better self.

Pete and some of his gang also managed to get aboard and, choosing well the moment of their attack, they quickly overpowered the captain, and tried to force him to disclose the hiding place of the diamonds. Failing in this effort, Pete had one of the men bring Ethel into the cabin, and, in spite of her effort to prevent him from weakening, Pete's threats of what would happen to her, caused Captain Arnold to disclose the hiding place. All of this was witnessed by Shorty, and Pete's treatment of the girl so enraged him that as soon as the men left the cabin to lower the boats, he crept in from his hiding place, and covered Pete with his own pistol, while Ethel securely fastened his hands behind him.

After releasing Captain Arnold, Shorty went on the deck, and employing a ruse, he got the men to go down one of the hatches. No sooner had the head of the last one disappeared, when he clapped on the hatch cover and securely fastened it. Quickly rowing to the shore, Shorty summoned the police, and the entire gang was arrested. When the sergeant, knowing of Shorty's connection with the gang, insisted on taking him along with the rest of the gang, Captain Arnold and Ethel made it quite plain that henceforth his home was to be with them.

JENKS AND THE JANITOR (Nov. 4).—The trouble all began when Mrs. Jenks went out calling and left Jenks to entertain his sister-in-law with whom he had never been able to get along. It was never possible for them to agree about anything so when Jenks showed her his new suit, the pattern of which was rather pronounced, an argument ensued which ended in Jenks' becoming so dissatisfied with the suit that he decided to dispose of it to the janitor. Mike was delighted at the chance of getting such a swell suit for ten dollars, and the transfer was quickly made. Worn out, Jenks returned to his apartment and decided to take a nap. Arranging the screen so that he would not be disturbed, he dropped off into the realm of Morpheus just as Mike, arrayed in his new purchase, decided to call on Maggie.

The loving pair were in the midst of an amorous discussion when Miss Liza entered the kitchen, and, recognizing the suit, thought it was Jenks. Pandemonium reigned as she chased Mike around the kitchen and out of the house, where she caught him as he tried to escape under a billboard and proceeded to punish him. The noise in the kitchen aroused Jenks, and just as he arrived there to catch the fainting maid in his arms, who should enter but Mrs. Jenks. Jumping at a wrong conclusion, she belabored Jenks with her parasol until Maggie suddenly revived and explained matters. The trio then started out after Miss Liza and Mike, and when the truth dawned on the old lady that she had the wrong man, she fell fainting into the arms of Mrs. Jenks. Mike, at first refused to be placated, but finally the humor of the situation dawned on him and all joined in a hearty laugh.

BUSTER BROWN PICKS OUT THE COSTUMES (Nov. 4).—When Annie and Bridget told Buster and Mary Jane that they were to attend a fancy dress ball given by the Plumbers' Friendship Association, the temptation for mischief was too great to be withstood by Buster and so he offered to secure the costumes. Annie and Bridget agreeing, Buster, Mary Jane and Tige trudged off to the costumer's and proceeded to pick out something that would make their friends the "observed of all observers."

Back they danced to the house to exhibit their prizes to the servants. The two girls were just as happy as children, and proceeded immediately to dress for the ball. As usual in the Brown household, complications now became the order of the day and the arrival of the minister set things going in most approved Buster Brown style. It was Bridget who answered the bell and when the minister caught sight of her portly form all rigged out in the tarletan skirts of a ballet dancer, it was all he could do to keep a straight face. Bridget, however, tried to carry things off with dignity and ushered him into the parlor while she went upstairs to announce his visit to Mrs. Brown.

In the meantime, Buster decided to bring the goat into the house so that he could see the two girls in their ballet costumes. This, of course, brought on more complications, which culminated in the wild stampede of the two servants right through the parlor where Mrs. Brown was trying to explain matters to the minister. The girls were quickly followed by Tige and the goat, with Buster and Mary Jane bringing up the rear, and, in an instant, the Brown household was in a state of uproar bordering upon pandemonium.

THE PINES OF LORY (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 6).—The coastwise steamer "Maid of the North" was about to leave for Montreal when Mr. Townsend, recognizing Patrick Boyd among the passengers, presented him to Elinor Marshall. They were both bound for Patrick's home, where Elinor was to pay a short visit to her school girl friend before proceeding to Montreal to become a nun. Her reception of Patrick was cool as she remembered the cloud under which he left home several years earlier. Patrick, it seemed, had refused to enter the church in accordance with his father's plan, and, in the resulting quarrel, Mr. Boyd succumbed to a sudden stroke of heart failure. As the result of his older brother's accusations, Patrick left his home, an outcast, and was now returning after a severe attack of fever in Africa.

In due time they were landed from the steamer, but owing to the dense fog the young couple found themselves in an entirely strange place. Nothing was left but to hunt for some habitation. That very night, the "Maid of the North" went down with all on board. Their search was soon rewarded but the house turned out to be one of mystery. It was fully provisioned and furnished, but, with the exception of a dog, no sign of life could be found. The mystery was added to when they entered the dining room and noticed the portrait of a beautiful woman affixed to the back of one of the chairs. Further search in the garden brought them to a grave, while beside it was another one, freshly dug, and finally they came upon an old gentleman sitting in the garden, but on addressing him they found, to their horror, that he was dead.

Completely mystified, they buried the mysterious owner in the freshly dug grave, and set about finding some escape from their predicament. In the midst of this effort Patrick's fever returned, and the whole burden was thrown upon Elinor, and little by little she became cognizant of a new sympathy for her fellow exile, which ripened during his convalescence into mutual love.

A rude chart, found in a desk, spurred them on to greater effort, but, in building a raft, Elinor fell into the water and though Patrick quickly sprang after her and brought her to shore, his strength was unequal to the tide, and he was quickly carried out to sea.

In the meantime, the daughter of the mysterious owner (who was, in reality, a banished French nobleman) waited anxiously in France for news of her father. Finally she decided to visit the island, and her arrival there came just at the very moment to save Elinor from madness, through her loneliness. Elinor's story was soon told and the Princess cleared the mystery by telling of her parents' banishment. They were about to leave the island when Patrick, who had been rescued by fishermen, appeared on the scene, and all repaired to the Boyd home, where happiness over Patrick's and Elinor's escape from disaster quickly brought about a reconciliation.

GETTING TO THE BALL GAME (Nov. 7).—Meekley was a real baseball fan, but, in spite of all his efforts to interest his wife, she stolidly refused to become enthusiastic, and furthermore, forbade him to attend the games. His friends joked him about it, and he took it as good naturedly as possible, until one day, three of his friends arrived with the news that they had a box reserved for the game and Meekly decided to disregard his wife's wishes and go anyway.

Making an excuse to his wife, he started for New York and every obstacle imaginable delayed him. First, the engine of his auto gave out, and, to his disgust, Meekly discovered that his supply of gasoline was exhausted. He finally secured a tow into a garage where he replenished his stock and continued his way to the game. Suddenly he had a blowout and it was a case of "get out and get under" with a vengeance, and when the job was finished and he was again on his way, he was suddenly confronted with a sign which showed him that he was on the wrong road.

In the meantime, his three friends were enjoying the game and had given up waiting for him to arrive. At last Meekly arrived, but only in time to see the very last play. Disgusted, he returned home and after a desperate effort to explain matters to his wife, he broke down and confessed the whole thing and was forgiven as he had not really seen the game.

THE CHOICE (Nov. 5).—The smuggling of opium increasing alarmingly, Captain Banes, of the Revenue Service, details his cleverest man, Ferron, to run down the guilty ones. He goes to the suspected district near a small fishing village and there saves a young girl from drowning, during which he becomes injured. He is carried to her home and there learns her name is Edith McKnight. While he is being nursed back to health, Ferron falls in love with her, proposes and they become engaged. While he is convalescing, he overhears her father and some other men in conversation, and decides he has accidentally stumbled right into the smugglers' nest. Ferron learns that a vessel is due with the smuggled drug aboard, concealed in a catch of fish. On the date of its arrival, he manages to hide himself aboard the boat that goes to meet the steamer, and after some exciting adventures, succeeds in corralling the gang by locking them in a wharf shed. He notifies the police, and while awaiting their arrival, Edith appears. She anxiously inquires if her father is in the shed, and on learning that he is, pleads with Ferron to release McKnight. He gently but firmly refuses, at which she demands that he choose between letting her father go and breaking their engagement. In the midst of a terrific struggle with himself, betwixt love and duty, Captain Banes and his men arrive. Ferron silently points to the shed door. The door is flung open and the smugglers made prisoners. To everyone's surprise, it is learned that Mr. McKnight is a Revenue Officer from another department, who, to obtain evidence, has been masquerading as a smuggler. This clears the situation and Edith makes no protest when Ferron slips the engagement ring back on her finger, while her father looks on with a smile.

THE MYSTERY OF BRAYTON COURT (Nov. 2).—Determined to get possession of Brayton Court, the estate of Stephen Arkwright, Antonio Marco, an Italian scientist, administers a poison to Arkwright, which causes his sudden death without leaving a trace of its action. Arkwright's daughter, Ione, inherits the estate and Marco succeeds in poisoning her in the same way, using a slower-acting drug. Wishing to avoid suspicion, Lynn Darmon, a struggling young doctor, is called in. Ione, without any apparent cause is languid and sickly. The case puzzles Lynn greatly, and when he learns from the nurse, Marion Hill, that she suspects crooked work, he determines to keep his eyes open. He finds a volume in the library on Oriental poisons and immediately connects the poison idea with Nogi, Marco's Indian servant.

Discovering that Marco is trying to get Ione to make a will in his favor, while she is under the influence of the poison, Lynn determines on quick action. With two detectives, he follows the villain to Mussen, a lawyer's, arriving just in time to prevent the property from being turned over to Marco. The detectives rush in, and after a struggle, Marco is arrested. At the trial Nogi kills himself with a poisoned needle, while his partner is sentenced to a long term in prison. Ione, freed from the poison inoculations, soon recovers, and Lynn receives his reward from Ione for all that he has done to solve the mystery of Brayton Court.

ON THE STROKE OF FIVE (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 3).—On his brother Vance's graduation from college, Guy Lansing Reynolds, a lawyer, promises to take him on a trip to Paris. When the time for leaving comes, Guy finds he cannot accompany Vance and, promising to follow shortly, sends the young man on alone. In Paris, Vance falls into the toils of Vera, an adventuress, and follows her to the "Schwarzwald Haus" in the Black Forest. She accepts his attentions and leads him to believe she returns his love. Prince Eugen, an old and wealthy friend of Vera's, arrives at the inn where they are staying. She must have rank and fortune, and returns to Paris with the prince, leaving a note for Vance telling of her intentions and adding that she no longer cares for him. Disillusioned, the young man shoots himself on the very day his brother arrives at the little German town. Guy learns from the innkeeper the story of Vance's death and swears vengeance on the faithless Vera. Following out his plan, he goes to Paris and there makes her acquaintance under an assumed name. She falls in love with him. He is gradually attracted by her, and inclined to relent, but his hate is rekindled by finding a half-burned picture of Vance in the fireplace. He has his friend Norton paint a life-sized portrait of Vance, and then invites Vera to visit him. The sudden sight of the picture—the disclosure of Guy's identity and his denunciations, drive her partly insane. Remorse-stricken, she returns to her apartments and sends Guy a note saying that on the stroke of five she will destroy herself. He rushes to her home to prevent this but arrives only to receive her dying kiss and prayer for forgiveness.

THE EVOLUTION OF PERCIVAL (Nov. 4).—Because of his effeminacy, Percival and Mildred are humiliated wherever they go. After some very distressing incidents in a restaurant, on the boardwalk and on the beach, she becomes thoroughly disgusted, and breaks off the engagement, saying she wants to marry a real man. Percival is almost heartbroken and confides his troubles to a friend, who suggests he make a hero of himself by fighting "Young Hickey," a pugilist. "Hickey" advertises that any man lasting three rounds with him will receive one hundred dollars. At the fight club, they see "Hickey" back his opponent up against a curtain, swing at him and the fellow drops like a log. Then Percival is shoved forward as the next "victim." The fighter stops behind the curtain and tells the husky standing there with a big mallet, that another "easy mark" is ready for the slaughter. "Hickey" returns to the ring, the gloves are adjusted, and after some fancy sparring, Hickey backs Percival into the corner in front of the curtain. He starts a vicious swing. Percival ducks and the prize-fighter bumps into the curtain. The man in back does not know it is Hickey, and the big mallet descends with crushing force just as Percival slaps the fellow's face. Hickey goes down and out, to everyone's bewilderment. Percival receives the 100 dollars and suddenly becomes famous, also very tough. Mildred is afraid of him and his new disposition. After securing a full measure of revenge on all his old enemies, he escorts Mildred to the seashore, where he makes ardent love to her. She repulses him and indignantly announces, "The man I love must be a gentleman!" Percival is stunned, and exclaiming "What's the use?" leaps overboard.

THANKS FOR THE LOBSTER (Nov. 6).—During a tango competition at Murphey's Jardin De Danse, Von Blotz, a professor of the terpsichorean art, enters the contest, but the judges and the crowd do not care for his old-style, dreamy waltzing. Consequently, when the prizes are given out, he gets the third—or "booby" prize—entitled, "A Living Likeness." It proves to be a live lobster. He is thrown out of the dancehall, but climbs back up the fire escape and steals the first prize, a silver loving cup, and returns home with both lobster and cup. He starts to cook the crustacean in the loving cup by holding it over the gas jet, but the chandelier and a large area of plaster falls on his head, shaken down by the tangoing going on overhead, underneath and all around. Finally, he goes to bed and dreams that the tenants of the nearby apartments are holding a tango competition, of which he is judge. He is disgusted at the sameness of the dancing, and declares, "He'll show 'em!" He selects a partner and is soon whirling about the room—upside down, on the ceiling! After performing some startling eccentricities, he winds up by whirling his partner out the window and running down to the street in time to catch her as she falls. He returns triumphantly and declares that in his judgment, he is the winner. A free-for-all fight starts—just as he wakes up. The bed has collapsed and he is almost suffocated. The neighbors rush in, and after resuscitating Von Blotz, all grab a portion of the lobster and go out shouting "Thanks for the lobster!" Von Blotz shakes his fist after them, then philosophically fills the cup with liquid refreshments, lights the pipe and smiles to himself.

IN THE LAND OF ARCADIA (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 7).—In pursuance of his theory that the ideal manner of raising children is to keep them apart from the world, Professor Landor, a widower with two children—Helene and Achilles, purchases Arcadia Island, in an unfrequented section of the country. There, with the aid of his friend, Professor Reichhart and Norah, a nurse, he rears the children. Helene is his own child but Achilles is a foundling whom the professor has adopted. When the children are grown, the isolation of the island palls upon them, particularly when Norah, who has discovered a small treasure, fills them with a craving to see the wonderful outside world. Aided by her, they build a raft and escape from the island. Nora dies from the shock of their perilous trip to the mainland during a terrible storm, and the two children are left alone in the world. On landing, they run into a party of young society people out picknicking. Marion Warner, the leading spirit of the party, suggests they show the two unsophisticated strangers something of the world and its pleasures. They create much amusement in their new surroundings by their awkwardness and unconventionality. Society takes them up and for a while, the two are in love with the world. They soon tire, however, and when Helene sees Achilles in the arms of Marion, she receives a rude awakening. Longing to be again in quiet Arcadia, she runs away. Achilles frantically follows her, leaving Marion without a thought.

GEORGE KLEINE.

ON THE BATTLE LINE (Special—Two Parts Oct. 13). Caron refuses to fight a duel with a hotheaded young Londoner and is branded as a coward. His friends desert him and he is cut by the woman he loves. Unable to face their scorn, he leaves for one of the British Colonies in Africa, where he settles near an army post and spends his time hunting big game with the officers stationed on the desert's edge. One day Caron goes hunting with Captain Pemberton, a dashing cavalry officer noted for his reckless courage. They are attacked and surrounded by a band of hostile Arabs and forced to fight for their lives against tremendous odds. A soldier who is with them succeeds in breaking through the encircling line and gallops away for help, leaving the two to fight off their assailants as best they can.

Both men fight like demons, but Pemberton soon falls, mortally wounded. Before dying, however, he unpins a medal from his blouse and hands it to Caron with the words "They gave it to me for bravery under fire; I could not leave it in worthier hands than yours." Soon a troop of cavalry gallops up, routs the Arabs and rescues Caron. Years later Caron returns to London. With him is his foster daughter Marjorie, whom he adopted as a child and who now is a beautiful young woman of seventeen. The girl meets and falls in love with Lieutenant Pemberton, son of the cavalry captain who died fighting shoulder to shoulder with Caron on the battle line. The specter of Caron's "cowardice" of years before is raised by his former associates, but the medal and the story of how it came into his possession dispel the cloud and he finds happiness in the joy of the young couple.

After rigging up a dummy resembling herself, she sticks it head first into the vat. She then leaves, but returns shortly after in a man's attire, telling the tailor she is Sweedie's brother. He weeps and wails, declaring that if Sweedie were only alive he would marry her in a minute. Sweedie then pulls off her disguise and the tailor falls in a dead faint.

THE FABLE OF "HOW UNCLE BREWSTER WAS TOO SHIFTY FOR THE TEMPTER" (Nov. 4). Aunt Mahaley knew Uncle Brewster was sporty, and when he went to the city to pay off his mortgage she warned him about being too free with his coin. He visited Roger Talbot, holder of the mortgage, who handed him two cigars. Uncle Brewster was dying for a smoke, but he remembered what Aunt Mahaley told him about cutting down expenses, and traded the cigars for a couple of boiled eggs, saving the price of lunch. At a fruit exhibit he filled his carpet bag, saving supper money. Before leaving the hotel he packed away everything in sight, so when he returned to Aunt Mahaley he was minus railroad fare but plus many towels and hotel silverware. Moral: Some people are good because it comes too high to be otherwise.

She steps into an adjoining room, where she is confronted by the man who had been so cruel to her years before. He threatens to expose her if she refuses to give him money. Broncho hears the conversation, and although in a weakened condition, forces the scoundrel to return the money, then escorts him across the boundary at the point of a gun.

HIS DEAREST FOES (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 6).—Lieutenant Gerald Calhoun, son of Colonel Calhoun, commander of an English garrison in India, is a wastrel and gambler. He gets heavily in debt and his mother secretly gives him a valuable sapphire ring to pay it. Gerald takes the ring and puts it up as a stake in a game of bridge with an Indian Rajah, who wagers a diamond pin against it. The lieutenant is losing, becomes desperate and resorts to cheating. He is discovered and denounced in his club by his fellow-officers. His father enters and hears all. He orders his son on a dangerous mission through the native lines, hoping that his possible death or the carrying out of the dangerous mission will save him from complete disgrace.

Gerald, who is a coward, begs his father not to send him. But the Colonel is obdurate. The boy pleads with his mother and she in turn goes to the Colonel and asks him not to send their son to his certain death. He refuses her request. She turns upon him and tells him he hates his son. She declares he has killed her love for him and rushes from the room. That night, when his son was supposed to be on his way, the Colonel finds him stupefied with drink. Long the Colonel stares at his son, the picture of cowardice and vice. He strives to understand how his own flesh and blood should have fallen so low. He writes a letter to his wife bidding her farewell and then starts out on the mission himself.

When Gerald wakes up and finds what his father has done, he is overwhelmed with remorse. His mother sees him, disheveled and trembling from his debauch, and turns on him and denounces him for his cowardice and weakness. They ride out in the morning listening to the call of conscience and praying for the Colonel's safety. They come across the Colonel lying face down in the road where he has fallen after a single-handed fight with the natives. A squad from the garrison arrives in time to rout the natives. Calhoun is carried to his home, where it is found that he will recover. Gerald comes into his father's room, begs forgiveness and lays his sword and uniform on the bed. The Colonel sees the new resolve in his son's eyes and realizes that he has awakened to the call of duty at last. They shake hands and the son departs for Canada, his mother weeping by the Colonel's bedside.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURER NO. 8—A PARTNER TO PROVIDENCE (Nov. 2).—The train on which Lord Cecil is traveling is wrecked, he being rescued by Jimmy Holt, the cashier of a construction company, who takes him to the home of Elsie, his sweetheart, which is near the scene of the accident. Lord Cecil is not seriously injured, and by the following day is able to be about. Peterson, the general superintendent of the construction company, is in desperate need and determines to rob the safe of the pay-roll funds, intending to cover his crime by a faked robbery of the safe by a couple of tramps. He secures the packet of money, substituting a dummy, an action which Lord Cecil chances to witness, but to which he attaches no significance at the time. Peterson's tools duly blow the safe, but are caught in the act by the sheriff. In the meanwhile Holt uneasy for the safety of the money has removed from the safe the packet which he supposes contains it so that the sheriff declares the safe to have been empty when blown open. Peterson had used the dummy package merely to blind Holt, it having been his plan for the tramps to remove and destroy it. Peterson is jealously jealous of Holt and now changes his scheme, intending not only to cover his own crime but to ruin Holt by fastening it upon him. He charges Holt with having stolen the money before the safe was blown. Holt triumphantly produces the package he has kept safely and explains why he removed it, reminding the sheriff that he Peterson scornfully denounces this as a bluff intended to give Holt a chance to escape, and demands that the money be shown to Holt's amazement and horror, the packet when opened consists only of worthless paper. Lord Cecil now remembers seeing Peterson handling the packet, and concludes that Peterson is the thief. He makes the charge, and Peterson by attempting to escape, confesses his guilt. As Elsie throws herself into Holt's arms, however, Peterson's jealousy overwhelms all other emotions, and he attempts to kill the younger man, but is disarmed by Lord Cecil. Shortly after Lord Cecil goes his way, passing forever out of the lives of the young lovers.

A BOOMERANG SWINDLE (Nov. 31.—Barton and Hanscon, two swindlers, to elude the police go to a little country village. At the hotel Barton reads an ad in the local paper of a furnished house and cultivated farm for sale and he plans to swindle the owner (Jouhan Splivens) out of a few hundred dollars. Barton calls on the farmer and pays him a five hundred dollar deposit on the farm. A few days later Hanscon calls and offers Splivens a thousand dollars more. Splivens tells him to call the following day for an answer. Barton returns to pay the balance and Splivens buys back the receipt for a thousand dollars.

Tom Pope, a young lawyer and the fiancee of Frances, the farmer's daughter, overhears the crook boasting of how he swindled the old man. Phoning to Splivens, Tom verifies his fears. Tom then gets a friend and taking him up to his room, which is next to the one occupied by the crooks, Tom gets him to say loud enough for the crooks to hear that the traction company want to buy the land and will pay ten thousand for it. The crooks fall for the plan. Hanscon rushes back to Splivens and buys the farm for six thousand, a gold watch and a diamond stick pin. Splivens is a little over four thousand in. Tom gets the girl and the two crooks go to jail.

THE SORCERESS (Special—Two Parts—Nov 41.—Leonard Rand, a rich art collector, his wife and child live in the suburbs of London. Hester, the wife, has ceased to respect her husband and resents the associations forced upon her of what he is pleased to call Bohemia. One night she receives a blow that causes her to decide to take serious action. The child, Violet, is taken among the riotous guests of painted women and finally given a glass of wine to drink. A stormy interview takes place and the husband tells his wife that if she does not like the atmosphere she is at liberty to go, but he will retain the child. On several occasions Hester has been wont to consult a gypsy seeress, named Carlotta, one of a tribe encamped close by, and in her emergency she goes for advice. The gypsy tells her that the tribe are about to migrate to America and Hester proposes that Carlotta shall take the child with them stipulating that she shall be restored to the mother upon demand. The plan is carried out and the little Violet is taken to America. Hester refuses to disclose the whereabouts of the child to the distracted father and dies suddenly.

Ten years elapse and Violet is brought up by Carlotta under the name of Perdita and a strong affection exists between the two. The Sorceress, as she is called, is eminently successful in America and acquires a fortune, but Frollo, her lover, insists that she shall still continue to live with the tribe. Perdita grows up to be a beautiful girl and Carlo, a fiery young member of the tribe, falls in love with her, but Carlotta is deeply opposed to a union, as she hopes some day she will restore Perdita to her own. One day Perdita while wandering through the woods encounters a hunting party led by Leonard Rand. He is attracted by the wild beauty of the girl and paints such pictures of the glittering existence in his world that the girl becomes inspired and leaves the tribe to go to the gorgeous home of Rand, whom she regards as an elderly man, unselfishly interested in a child, whom he wishes to endow with his wealth, but on finding the true character of Rand she decides to return to Carlotta, only to find herself a close prisoner in the home of the man she has learned to fear. The excitement causes brain fever and her mind becomes almost destroyed. Carlotta discovers Rand and to work her point proceeds to infatuate him. She is successful. With the aid of Frollo they obtain evidence of the fact that Perdita is Rand's lost daughter and Carlotta fulfills the pledge, made to the mother, that the girl would be restored to her own.

THE STOLEN YACHT (Special—Two Parts Nov. 5).—Carroll, cruising in his yacht, finds it necessary to put in at the shipyard of Fulton for some minor repairs and his little daughter, Miriam, meets the shipbuilder's boy, Frank. Childlike affection results and Carroll hurries Miriam away, explaining that she is a little lady and mustn't associate with shipbuilders' sons.

Fifteen years later Frank is in technical college and Miriam in a fashionable university. Frank's chum, invited to the university, brings Frank, and Frank and Miriam meet, fall in love, and plan to marry, ignorant of the fact that they ever met in life before. Carroll consents on condition that they wait until Frank makes good in the world. Carroll and Miriam leave for another cruise. Fulton calls Frank home as Alexander, a rival, is taking away much of his business through crooked work. Carroll again puts in at this harbor for repairs and Alexander bribes the captain so that when Carroll discovers that Miriam's lover is Fulton's son, he is led to promise Alexander the work. But the discovery of Alexander's bribe switches Carroll to Fulton again, when Fulton promises to keep Frank away during the yacht's stay. Frank's hobby is motor boats, and, suspecting further crooked work on the part of Alexander, he uses the boat on some detective work and finds that Alexander has become the victim of some revolutionary agents, who, to smuggle ammunition into their country, plan to steal Carroll's yacht. Carroll refuses to heed Frank's warning, but Miriam rushes down to the boat and is carried away when it is stolen. Frank pursues the conspirators in his motorboat, carrying Fulton and Carroll, and wins Carroll's approval of the match.

LOVE TRIUMPHS (Nov. 6).—Dora Armstrong, a trained nurse is sent by Dr. Wentworth to take care of Mrs. Gordon, an elderly invalid. She meets Mrs. Gordon's son, John, who is a lawyer with an ambition to be District Attorney. John and Dora fall in love, but his selfishness and political ambition come first. For fear that his marriage with a nurse might hurt his political chances he insists that their marriage be a secret one. Dora objects, but John finally wins her over. Later Dora, worrying over her secret and its coming result, tells John that Dr. Wentworth is suspicious of their actions and that they should declare their marriage. John refuses to make announcement and Dora, too proud to tell him her real reason, quarrels with him. She can see but one way out and that is to go away. A letter to Dr. Wentworth tells him that she is going away and he had better send another nurse to Mrs. Gordon at once.

The doctor gets into communication with the Gordons and John and his mother are mystified to find Dora gone. John is especially wrought up and his actions in answering the doctor's questions when he brings another nurse, and his attitude toward the letter the doctor shows him, confirms the learned gentleman's opinion that John knows more than he will tell. Dora goes to a little village where she takes up lodgings with a sympathetic old couple who respect her secret and treat her as one of their own. John's mother dies and all his efforts to locate Dora fail and the duties of his new office slowly undermine his health, and he becomes a changed man.

Meanwhile Dora has given birth to a child which is far from healthy and the old country doctor decides to call in a specialist. The specialist turns out to be Dr. Wentworth who, amazed to at last find Dora, learns the whole truth of her marriage. Incensed, he swears to make John pay for his ill treatment, but Dora begs him to let matters rest as they are. Upon his return, John goes to see him regarding the condition of his health and the old doctor seeing a way to mend the broken thread, compels John to go away for a rest and sends him to the town and house that Dora inhabits. He finds the old couple and while they are arranging for his comfort he sees Dora putting her baby to sleep. He makes his presence known and for a moment Dora hesitates—then, all the pent-up emotion of the lonesome months bursts forth and she sobs out her love and forgiveness in his arms.

They drop their instruments in disgust and wander down the street. Hans finds a copy of a paper telling how kidnappers held a child for ransom and suggests that they kidnap Willie Gold, son of the town's richest man, and make a million dollars. They get a wheelbarrow and coax Willie out for a ride. He is rather a spoiled child and it is not easy to handle him, but they manage after a fashion and all goes well until Willie spies a friend going back to town in an auto. With a very brief good-bye to his new friends he rides home to his nurse who all this time has been spooning with her pet policeman. She finds him playing just as she left him. It is not the same with Hans and Jake, however, but different in the extreme.

HIS INSPIRATION (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 2).—Although Franz rates his ability as a composer very highly, his wife, Anna, is the real source of his inspiration. A song suggested by Anna brings Franz fame and fortune. Infatuated by Vera, an actress, Franz urges her to elope with him. Because it means publicity, Vera consents. Later, however, she leaves Franz in the lurch. Ashamed to return home, Franz becomes a wanderer. Unable to compose new songs, the man is reduced to beggary.

Anna, sure her husband will return, turns a deaf ear to the pleas of Maynard, a former suitor. While thinking of Franz one morning, the wife, seated at the piano, unconsciously composes a new song. A few streets away, the husband stands in the bread line. Mental telepathy causes the theme played by Anna to be repeated in Franz's mind. The man hastens to his publisher with whom the song finds instant favor. Franz swallows his pride and returns home. There he hears Anna playing the air. Astounded, the husband discovers the source of his inspiration. With head humbly bowed, Franz begs to be forgiven.

LIZZIE, THE LIFE SAVER (Nov. 3).—The feud waged between Ham and his assistant, Bud, waxes stronger, when Ham accidentally swats Wise, the owner of the building, in the face with a mop. Ham and Bud are fired. In revenge, the former chases the latter with blood in his eye. Angered by the swat, Wise discharges his stenographer, Lizzie, when he sees her flirting with Johnny, his nepew. Lizzie later gets a job as a life saver at the beach. All the men at the resort promptly try to drown, much to Johnny's jealousy.

In the meantime Bud gets away from Ham by leaping into a motorboat. In his effort to stop the craft, Ham seizes hold of the mooring line and is dragged all over the bay. Bud beaches the vessel and flees, with Ham close behind. Wise comes to the beach. He falls into the water and is on the verge of drowning when Lizzie and Johnny come to his rescue. His gratitude causes the wealthy uncle to present them with a check for $5,000. As for Bud and Ham, the former enters a sewer outlet to escape from bloodthirtsy Ham. Too large a man to follow, Ham secures a three-pronged gaff and waits for his foe to emerge.

THE PRISON STAIN (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 4).—Kelsey is a trusty in the prison where Jean Darrel is serving her sentence. The two are discharged on the same day. Keeping her past a secret, Jean later becomes the wife of Gregg, a lawyer. Kelsey makes good and is appointed manager of a lumber company. Gregg and Kelsey become friends. Invited to spend the week-end at the lawyer's home, Kelsey is astounded to discover that his hostess is none other than Jean. During the evening, conversation turns into sociological channels. Unaware that Kelsey is an ex-convict, Grebb declares that the prison leaves a stain which can never be removed. It is his opinion that once a crook, always a crook.

That night, Bunts, the butler, steals a large sum of money from Gregg's safe. The man escapes from the house, but his suspicious actions later bring about his arrest. Gregg discovers his loss. A horrible suspicion enters the minds of Jean and Kelsey. A policeman who is summoned, recognizes the two and denounces them as ex-convicts. Gregg is stunned. As he turns upon Jean and Kelsey, his 'phone rings. Answering, he learns that Bunt has confessed his theft under the third degree. Gregg then realizes how unjust his suspicions have been. Placing his arms about the shoulders of his wife and his guest, he informs them that his narrow-minded views have been swept away forever.

THE INDIAN SUFFRAGETTES (Nov. 6).—Dishwater, a maid of the Oompah tribe, returns from the Government school a militant suffragist. At first, the members of her tribe are inclined to combat her views, but, aided by her umbrella, Dishwater clubs the braves into submission.

The terrorized warriors learn that the suffragist is organizing a revolt among the squaws. They are helpless to prevent the feminine uprising which follows. As the result of their demand for equal rights, the squaws succeed in assuming the occupations formerly pursued by the braves, while the latter take care of the papooses and do the housework.

Headed by Dishwater, the squaws leave on a hunting expedition. They meet their Waterloo, however, when they come upon a war party from a rival tribe. The suffragettes' pleas for help are ignored by their own braves until a solemn promise is registered that in the future the women consent to play second fiddle. This done, the Oompah warriors help defeat their foes.

THE MAN IN THE VAULT (Nov. 7).—John Norton, posing as a successful business man, is in reality a master cracksman. The strongest vaults are easily opened by the wonderful electrical tools invented by him. Tom, Norton's son, is his valuable assistant. The boy is sent to Maxdale to obtain information concerning a bank which he and his father plan to loot. Just as he is ready to stage the robbery, Tom rescues Evelyn Van Pult, who is being insulted by a gang of rowdies. The girl is the daughter of the bank president. Tom falls in love with her and is inspired to lead an honest life. Attracted by the young man, Van Pult makes him his secretary.

Enraged by what he thinks is a yellow streak in Tom, Norton resolves to burglarize the bank alone. His electrical tools open the vault on the night that Tom and Evelyn make public their betrothal. Van Pult enters the bank for some documents he had forgotten. Discovering the burglar in the vault he slams the steel door into place, imprisoning Norton in the iron chamber. Tom learns what has occurred. He battles with the problem of either losing his sweetheart or of seeing his father sent to prison. Tom later fells the officer guarding his father, thus aiding the latter to escape. Later, Norton comes to the realization of his son's great sacrifice. Not to be outdone, the father appears before Van Pult and Evelyn and confesses all. Norton's vow to turn over a new leaf, and their love for Tom, decides the banker and his daughter Father and son are forgiven.

THE RIDDLE OF THE GREEN UMBRELLA (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 9).—Helmar, an eccentric old professor, owns a green umbrella, the handle of which was once a portion of a deadly instrument used by the Borgias. Lloyd and Reynolds, two young professors, are rivals for the hand of Dorothy, Helmar's daughter. Reynolds, is discovered to have misappropriated the funds of the college by Helmar and Lloyd. He is ordered to return the money within twenty-four hours. Reynolds has been experimenting with racinus, the deadliest poison known. Merely inhaling it causes death. Helmar enters a barber shop the following day. Reynolds, disguised as a tramp, follows. Later, when the barber finishes shaving Helmar, he discovers the professor is dead.

Madelyn Mack takes charge of the case. She suspects Reynolds. The latter has cleverly fastened the crime upon Lloyd by means of the green umbrella. Aided by a vocaphone and a detectaphone, she secures positive evidence of Reynolds' guilt. Disguised as a chambermaid, Madelyn enters the man's apartment. He captures her, however, and announces his intention of giving her a hypodermic which will deprive her of her memory. The man sneeringly tells the helpless girl that he murdered Helmar by placing racinus in his shaving mug. The professor inhaled the fumes of the drug and perished. Just as Reynolds is about to give Madelyn the memory-depriving drug, the girl, picking up a vial standing on the table, dashes it into his face. It contains racinus. Reynolds crumples up just as detectives, who have overheard his confession, enter.

A TWISTED AFFAIR (Nov. 3).—The Browns and Smiths are neighbors in a suburban town. The Brown family receive a letter from their niece in South Africa saying that she has landed in New York and will arrive for an extended visit on the 4:30 train. As the Browns have never seen their niece she writes that she can be identified by a large black bow on her hat. The Smith family, who live next door, receive word from an employment agency that the new cook, which they have been asked to engage, will arrive on the 4:30 train. When the cook arrives at the station she has a big black bow on her hat. Brown's chauffeur, being guided entirely by the description given him, invites her into the limousine and motors her home under the impression that she is the expected niece.

While this is all taking place, the Smiths' coachman arrives at the station somewhat belated and mistakes the Browns' niece for the Smiths' new cook sent by the employment agency. The cook, on arriving at the home of the Browns, is received and entertained royally, while on the other hand, the real niece is delivered into the kitchen of the Smiths and shown to an attic bedroom. The cook, a typical Biddy, is very fond of her "Grog," and brings much disgrace to the Browns and their guests who have been assembled to greet the niece. While entertaining the Browns' supposed niece, the Browns' maid-of-all-work throws up her job unexpectedly, and to meet this contingency the Browns send to their neighbors, the Smiths, to borrow their cook until the departure of the "niece."

In this way the Browns discover their real niece who was being used as the Smiths' cook. Recognition and explanations quickly follow, the impostor is thrown out and the niece is installed in her rightful position with everybody happy.

THE GENIUS (Biograph K. & E.—Special—Three Parts—October).—One of the sprightliest comedies ever produced on the stage, this delightful play in motion pictures is a swift succession of scenes whose humor will occasion gales of laughter. In order to win the girl he loves, John Spencer must become an artist, and he doesn't care how much it costs. So he arranges to pose as instructor to a group of starving artists. His rival for the girl's hand, Percival Clutterbuck, is a well-known art connoisseur; and when he discovers Jack's "genius" he publishes it to the world. Josephine Van Dusen, the girl Jack loves, thereupon consents to marry him and insists that he announce their engagement. But Jack has fallen genuinely in love with Nell Graham, an artists' model, and now he tells Josephine: "You are my inspiration, and if I were to marry you my inspiration would cease." Nell overhears the conversation, and when Jack tells Josephine the truth—that he cannot paint a stroke and knows nothing about art—she realizes that he is doing it for her sake. Jack's confession, instead of being accepted as the truth, is hailed as one more eccentricity of his genius. So, unable to get rid of his great reputation, he marries Nell and lives happily ever after.

Bob befriends May Edwards, a tea-garden singer, and is caught in the meshes of the law by the cunning Dalton, who tricks him into passing a counterfeit twenty-pound note. Bob is sentenced to serve four years in prison. Three years later, discharged on a ticket of leave, he secures a position in Gibson's bill-broking office. Dalton and Moss discover where Bob is working, and plan to get him into their clutches; but with the aid of Hawkshaw, the famous detective, the crooks are rounded up after many thrilling developments.

THE WIFE'S STRATAGEM (Oct. 29).—In ridding himself of the woman whom he has ceased to love, the man does not hesitate to be brutal. A passer-by intervenes, becomes interested in the girl, and later marries her. Years later, chance brings the girl across the path of the man who once treated her so basely.

THE TIDES OF SORROW (Oct. 30).—Captain Ford of the fishing crew is in love with Ruth, daughter of an old fisherman, but the girl has a sweetheart, one Elliot, a dissolute scamp. On the fishing banks, alone with Elliot in a dory, Ford has a struggle with the drunken man and Elliot is drowned. When the ship returns Ford is tried for Elliot's murder and found guilty on circumstantial evidence. Ruth accuses him—"You have killed Elliot because I loved him."

HEARTS OF GOLD (Oct. 31).—When two women love the same man, and there is a reason—perhaps the strongest of reasons—why the one should consider the feelings of the other, what will be her decision?

SELIG.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO 68 (Oct. 22).—This release offers a striking balloon race at Pittsfield, Mass., known as the National Pursuit race and patterned after the famous German races in which their military aviators are trained. Another picture is the Athletic race at Fresno in which a world's record mark is equalled and showing also a cycle car race, one of the first in motion pictures. There is also an Industrial Exposition at Paterson, N. J., in which Gov. Fielder takes part and which is held to boost the idea of "made in America" goods. They have also a fashion section showing some very pretty evening wraps and gowns. Designers all over the country have been commenting on their pictures because of the wonderful correctness of the styles. In the war section the destruction caused by the German guns at Malines is shown in a number of striking pictures of ruins, among which is an old cathedral which was repeatedly struck and severely damaged. There are also scenes at Ostend now threatened by German invasion and a remarkable series of pictures showing an English concentration camp where German prisoners of war are interned. The Germans under the guns of English guardsmen perform the manual labor of the camp.

THE MYSTERIOUS HAND NO. 1 (My Lady Raffles)—(Three parts, Oct. 24).—There is a little slavey working in an English boarding house. She accidentally discovers the "swag" of a couple of cooks one day, but dismisses the event from her mind, owing to the kindness which the men have shown her.

Kelly, the detective, locates the two crooks at the boarding house and, to watch them, he secures a room next to theirs in the same house. In making up the detective's bed one morning, the slavey comes across his revolver and handcuffs. She divines that he is there to cause trouble to her friends in the next room. Later, the detective corners the crooks. The little slavey, however, facilitates their escape.

Five years later we find the slavey in a magnificent suite of rooms occupied by herself and the two crooks, whom she befriended. Under their direction she has gained the soubriquet of "My Lady Raffles".

Reading of a fashionable wedding to take place and of the many beautiful wedding presents, "My Lady Raffles" decides to turn them to her own account. She and her friends visit an antique shop, where they select a handsome cedar chest. The proprietor returns from the rear of the shop to find the two men alone. They order the chest sent to the address where the wedding is to take place.

Detective Kelly is invited to the wedding as a guest, but incidentally to guard the many valuable gifts. After the party is over, he alone occupies the room, which is in semi-darkness. He has a premonition that all is not right. All at once the lid of the cedar chest, which is among the gifts, begins to rise slowly. Kelly watches and sees a white hand emerge. This mysterious hand travels about among the gifts selecting the most valuable. Overcoming his surprise, Detective Kelly seizes the hand, which is all he can see in the gloomy room. He draws his revolver. It is accidentally discharged. His captive escapes in the confusion. Kelly, however, has had time to observe that the hand bears a peculiar birthmark between the thumb and first finger. Cudgeling his brain he recalls that the little slavey in the boarding house of five years before had just such a mark.

Outside the house, "My Lady Raffles" makes good her escape in the automobile. Detective Kelly pursues in his machine. As previously arranged, the crooks are met by a car coming in the opposite direction. The girl leaps into the other machine and speeds back toward the scene of the crime, thus eluding the detective, who follows the machine containing the two men. Kelly locates the house occupied by the crooks, and by a ruse, admits himself. "My Lady Raffles", meanwhile, had returned. Detective Kelly proceeds to place her under arrest. She asks permission to put on a skirt, as she is only clad in a little black velvet suit with bloomers. This is granted by Kelly. She steps behind a curtain. A moment later the detective hears a sound of a panel sliding to. He hears a machine outside and rushes to the window. From the speeding car "My Lady Raffles" throws back a kiss to the outwitted detective.

Thinking he had fired the shot, she throws a rolling pin at him and knocks him down. The gun is exploded. The bullet hits a painter and knocks him from his ladder. The maid, remembering Harsleigh, asks to be taken to Newport as an heiress, Mrs. Clifton is forced to consent.

At Newport the maid is quite a lion among Mrs. Clifton's friends. Harsleigh falls in love with the girl and pushes his suit. While walking one day, the pair are followed by Louise Jones who is is love with Harsleigh. She observes Harsleigh propose and the girl accept.

On their return to the drawing room, Harsleigh announces the engagement, Louise tells him he is making a fool of himself, that he is marrying a maid. When the maid refuses to tell who she is, Harsleigh denounces her as an impostor. At this moment a foreign Chancellor, a tutor and retinue of maids enter and acclaim the maid none other than a Princess of the Royal and the First Lady in Europe.

The Princess leaves with her retinue and returns to the Royal Palace in Europe. Shortly after, she receives a letter from Harsleigh declaring his love for her and begging forgiveness. The Princess destroys the letter and thinks only of what might have been if Harsleigh had not failed when "his big chance" came.

When the crook appeared and commenced to ransack the house, Lady took down the telephone receiver and by barking, aroused the neighborhood. Then she went after the intruder; she pounced upon him and a struggle followed. Neighbors came running toward the house. A policeman was warned. The thief, in the meantime, had about succeeded in breaking away from Lady. As he was climbing out the back window, the policeman captured him.

An elopement is planned quite the thing under such circumstances and it is carried into effect. The marriage is really performed—but then, father pops up at the wrong moment and spoils it all. He separates the pair, abuses the boy and sends his daughter off to a girl's boarding school.

At this turn in affairs Eddie is somewhat flabagasted. He is at his wits end when an advertisement suggests an idea. The advertisement is for a middle-aged professor at the same boarding school where his lady-love is holding forth. Eddie disguises himself for the part, applies and secures the position.

For a time matters run smoothly. Then the janitor observes, one night, the girls smuggling eatables into their sleeping rooms. Accordingly, he tells the mistress of the school about it. The gallant Eddie overhears, and, having the welfare of the girls at heart, he hastens up to warn them. NAN OF THE HILLS (Nov. 6).—Nan Walsh, keeper of a restaurant in a small mining town, is engaged to marry Bob Davis, a young prospector. True to her expectations, Bob makes good and uncovers a vein of rich pay ore. He hastens to tell Nan. She accompanies him back to the scene of his operations. Arriving there they find that the claim has been jumped in their absence and the Law, in person of a constable, is protecting the rights of the claim-jumper.

Despondent over this incident, Bob hits upon a plan to at least reap part of the fruit of his labors. Not wishing to hurt anyone in the operation, he extracts the bullets from the cartridges in his revolver and sallies forth to hold up the wagon upon which the claim-jumper is sending a load of ore for shipment to the railroad.

Unfortunately for Bob, Jim Haswell, sheriff of the county, is riding in the vicinity. Drawing his revolver he tries to take the would-be robber, but fails. He then gathers a posse and sets out to capture Bob. Bob seeks refuge in Nan's restaurant. When all ruses fail to convince the sheriff that Bob is not there, she recalls to him an affair in which she was instrumental in saving his life. Confronted with this page from the past, the sheriff rides away with his posse. Thus, Nan saves her lover from capture and together they watch the former pursuers fade away into the distance.

GOLD SEAL.

THE TREY O' HEARTS (14th Installment. Two Parts, Nov. 3).—Toward the close of the same day whose noon witnessed the affair of the mine, a solitary motorist may be observed slowly approaching the mountain village of Mesquite—in a motorcar drawn by two horses. The solitary motorist is none other than Seneca Trine.

Repairing to the Mountain house, Mr. Trine finds there his two aides—Marrophat and Jimmy. Seneca's gloom is changed to joy when he is informed of Marrophat's brilliant coup of the abandoned mine. Trine has them make him comfortable for the night. In the act of bidding him goodnight, Marrophat, feeling in his pocket for a match, brings forth a Trey O' Hearts. He laughingly displays it and carelessly sails it out of the open window.

In the course of the night, Judith, Rose, Alan and Barcus are to be seen camping by the trailside. Peace has been patched up between the sisters, though Rose is still suspicious and watchful of Judith's attitude in respect of Alan. Judith, divining this, suspicions by starting up a flirtation with Barcus.

Waking at an early hour, the party sets out for Mesquite, reaching that village while the shadows are still long. As they approach the hotel, Rose utters a cry of terror, and points down to the trey o' hearts. With this warning, Alan calls Barcus and Judith back from the entrance to the hotel; and the discovery of the stalled motorcar waiting round in some conspicuous place confirms their apprehensions. They promptly set about finding some expeditious way out of town. Barcus unearths two motorcycles. The party sets out.

The noise of the motors wakens Seneca Trine. He wheels his chair to the window in time to see Alan and Rose tearing off in a cloud of dust. Marrophat and Jimmy stagger sleepily into Trine's presence. His information drives them out quickly enough, in search of some conveyance in which to pursue. They find nothing until, after sometime, a gentleman of the countryside drives into town in his 80-horsepower racer. This machine, Marrophat proceeds to purchase. Jimmy, meantime, purchases a rifle. In spite of the long lead Alan et al. have gained the racing car is quickly at their heels. After something like an hour of furious racing, Barcus' motorcycle develops trouble and comes to a full stop. This happens when he was perhaps hundred-yard lead of Alan and Rose; to avoid running Barcus and Judith down, Alan steers his cycle too close to the outer edge of the road. It shoots over the edge and down the 90 foot declivity. They roll to the bottom and escape unhurt. Jimmy takes an ineffective shot at Barcus in passing. Judith replies by whipping out her revolver.

Barcus, when he has joined Rose and Alan with Judith at the bottom of the declivity, points out that the accident has occured at the mouth of a canyon, which may afford them a way of escape. They accordingly strike out afoot. Suspecting that they have been tricked, Marrophat and Jimmy halt the racing car until chance favors them with a glimpse of their landscape.

They find a side trail which enables them to overcome in a great measure the lead of the fugitives before rough going compel them to abandon the car and continue the pursuit afoot.

The discovery that they are closely pursued comes to the fugitives simultaneously with the discovery that the canyon ends abruptly in a steep, sheer rocky cliff. Alan finds two lengths of rope. Barcus and Rose are hitched together with one of these and start the ascent. Alan and Judith follow tied to one another. Jimmy's magazine rifle runs out of ammunition. He has no more. His revolver and Marrophat's as usual fail to do any damage. Finding the prospect of the climb little to their taste, they turn back, regain the racing car, and seek another way of overtaking the fugitives.

Barcus and Rose mount without mishap. When Alan is near the top however Judith, below him, loses her foot hold and plunges out over the abyss. Her full weight coming suddenly on the rope, pulls his feet from under him. He falls sprawling and his legs are well out over the ledge, while he grasps in vain for a handhold. Judith appreciating his peril, ships a knife and deliberately severs the rope. She falls about fifty feet and lands on a shelving bank of shale.

Alan relieved of her weight, crawls back on the ledge. For a time he lies there, sick with the vision he has of Judith dashed to death. Rose and Barcus witness the accident from the top. Barcus discovers a hydraulic mining outfit at some distance. There is a man in charge of it. He offers Barcus rope and tackle wherewith to rescue Judith. They return to the cliff.

When Alan recovers, he looks down and sees Judith safe. He effects the rescue—is drawn to safety with Judith in his arms. As the two gain the top of the cliff, Rose, catches sight of Marrophat's car toiling upward. Thus warned, the party runs for the hydraulic mining outfit. The miner swings the hydraulic nozzle directly on the machine. The stream hits the car like a cannon ball, carries it back several feet, and over the edge of the cliff. Exit Marrophat and Jimmy for good.

ECLAIR.

THE VIOLINIST (Two parts—Oct. 21).—Margaret McDonald, reared in cultured surroundings and daughter of a rich man, falls violently in love with the poor violinist, Enrico. When this is discovered by the girl's father, there is a violent scene. He objects to his daughter marrying a porr man and, to make sure of the separation, he forbids the violinist to see his daughter. After several attempts to defeat the old man's plans, Enrico is discouraged and heart-broken. He plans to return to his own country. Before sailing, he writes to Margaret, urging her to marry him at once. They are married secretly, and very soon the violinist sails away to Italy, expecting his wife to follow.

In years that follow, Enrico wins fame and fortune in his native country. However, his struggle has been a lonesome one, for he has received no word from his early sweetheart. His letters have remained unanswered. This, we learn, was due to the girl's father, who had taken care to have all the mail passing between the young couple, intercepted.

It is a black day when Enrico receives a short letter from America, briefly stating that Margaret McDonald had died suddenly. He feels that life is not worth the living, that ambition is not worth the struggle. But with the longing to be at least near the grave of his sweetheart, he returns to America. Once in this country, he searches out his former street musicians and, in time, becomes, with them, a wanderer.

Years pass. Margaret's daughter, Ethel, has grown to charming girlhood. On an afternoon, she hears the strains of her mother's favorite melody, "Miserere", floating to her through the open window. Fascinated by the music she invites the humble violinist into the house. He plays for her and then they talk. Her grandfather enters the room and confronts the musician. However, Enrico's identity is not disclosed. He leaves the house, a new ambition aroused in him. Alone with the grandfather, he promises the old man he will return to claim his daughter, and that when he does return, they shall not be ashamed of him.

Days pass and by constant study and work, the violinist is able to regain his technique. This time he becomes a famous musician in his adopted country, America.

There is a big music recital, to which Ethel and her grandfather are invited. Enrico is present and he charms with his music. The old man presents the girl to Salerno, the famous violinist. She recognizes him as her street musician. Then it is that Enrico discloses his real identity, and as the picture discloses, we find father and daughter folded in each other's arms.

THE RETURN (Two Parts—Nov. 4).—At the opening of the play Tom Henderson is shown as a young ranchman devoted to his widowed mother and deeply in love with Edna Williams, the daughter of a neighboring ranchman. Tom's father had gone to a drunkard's grave. Time comes when young Tom, after a battle, succumbs to the inheritance. He frequents the village saloon and rapidly goes downhill. Jack Warren is also a suitor for Edna's hand and he takes the opportunity to show the girl that Tom is rapidly becoming a drunkard. After a scene one night in the saloon, the young ranchman comes home to find that the girl has broken her engagement and is to become the wife of Jack. This brings Tom to a realization. Not daring to face his former sweetheart, he decides to start life anew in another section of the country. Time passes and Edna becomes the wife of Jack. It is not long, however, before he shows his true character. He kills a man. Deserting his wife and baby, he flees the village and escapes into Mexico.

Meanwhile, Tom is steadfastly following the straight and narrow path. He has become one of the Texas rangers and is respected for his fearlessness and straight living. Time comes when he receives instructions to round up a bunch of smugglers carrying guns into Mexico. He has little trouble discovering their den and a chase follows. It leads him to his home town. He cannot resist the temptation to visit his old sweetheart. For the first time he learns her sad story. While the pair are talking Edna's little girl brings in news of the smugglers. Tom takes advantage of the clue.

The smugglers are cornered. A terrible fight ensues during which Tom is shot by one of the gang. Watching the fight from her doorway, Edna sees her former sweetheart sink down. With a steady aim, she shoots the smuggler as he is about to kill Tom outright. She then rides out to where Tom is bending over the dead man. Lifting the hat from his face, they find that Edna has killed her own husband. The old time romance between the young people is resumed.

AT THE CRUCIAL MOMENT (Nov. 8).—Dr. Bronson has a theory for a new operation. Chief among the scoffers is old Dr. Dayton, the father of the young surgeon's fiancee. Bronson has worked so hard that his mind has begun to weaken under the strain. The first evidence of this is detected by his sweetheart who warns her father. At this crisis a man offers himself to young Bronson and a volunteer subject for the experiment, Bronson having promised him a large sum in payment for the service. The applicant, whose child is dying for want of things which money could buy, readily submits to the Doctor's terms. After hearing his daughter's suspicions, old Dr. Dayton hastens to the office where he finds that a man has been prepared for the operation. He warns the attendants to be on the alert for any signs of insanity on the doctor's part. In the meantime, the young wife of the man who has offered to sell his own life that his child might live, discovers her husband's plan and hastens after him. The patient is stretched upon the operating table and an anesthetic administered. The old doctor, the nurse and the attendants, ready at a moment's notice to spring upon the young surgeon, see him approach the operating table, take from his pocket a test tube containing a deadly culture and dash the contents upon his sterilized scalpels. They all spring towards him but the maniac whips a gun from his pocket and holds them at bay. Gun in hand he lays the patient bare for the incision, and just as he raises the murderous scalpel the victim's wife enters the room with a policeman. When the spectator's emotions are straining towards the breaking point, it is discovered that the gruesome deed is only a moving picture thrill!

COUNTRY INNOCENCE (Two Parts—Oct. 19).—Jim and Winnie are sweethearts. Jim is a hunter. Neither he nor the girl know the great cities. Wandering through the woods one day, Winnie meets David Graham, a city gentleman. Pursuing the unconventional ways of the woods, Graham enters into conversation with the girl and is soon struck by her innocence and beauty. Winnie, on the other hand, is impressed with Graham's fine manners. We soon find them seeking pleasant tete-a-tetes alone in the woods. Jim discovers this and attempts, in his rough way to interfere. Winnie resents this, much to his astonishment. When Jim presses his point she breaks off her engagement. Later, Graham persuades Winnie to go with him to the city.

A year passes. Winnie returns, broken in spirit, dishonored, and with a child in her arms. Jim takes her in and, out of pity, marries her before she dies, in order to give a name to the child.

Years pass. The child grows to beautiful young womanhood. Dick Carson, trapper, woos and wins her. About this time Jim, the foster father, is blinded, while hunting in the woods, by a gun accident.

We now turn to Graham, who has married in the meantime. With his son Edmund, he leaves the city, to spend the summer at his home in the hills. Edmund's first meeting with Dick is in the hills. Edmund informs Dick that he is trespassing upon the grounds belonging to his father. Dick refuses to listen. Edmund seeks the aid of his father to force the intruder off. It is while he is on this mission that Edmund first meets the girl and, like his father before him, he takes a fancy to her; and Dick, like Jim, instructs Edmund to keep away from the girl. Following this, there is a fight between the two boys. Dick tells the girl that she must refuse to speak to the stranger again. Winnie, like her mother before her, declares that she will do as she pleases.

Fearing for the girl's safety, Dick visits the home of Graham and tells the father of the circumstances. The father laughs. His remark, "Boys will be boys", is the only satisfaction he will give. Dick threatens. Graham, fearing for his own safety, has bear traps set around his home.

Later, we find Winnie, the younger, infatuated with Edmund. With Edmund it is simply a case of passing amusement. With Winnie it seems serious. Edmund tells Winnie of the city, of the streets, which are paved with gold, as it were. Winnie finally consents to accompany Edmund in an elopement.

That night the girl leaves a note for her foster father, telling of her action, and naming the man she is going away with. Dick is present when the old man discovers the note. Dick reads it aloud. The old man asks him to repeat the name again, "Graham"—the old man insists that Dick lead him to the house. Face to face with the older Graham, he informs him that his own son has run away with his daughter, that the eloping couple are brother and sister. He tells the older Graham who he is, and how he came to marry Winnie's mother.

The scene shifts to the buggy carrying the eloping couple. The horse has taken fright—he bolts. There is a wild dash and a terrific smash as horse, buggy and occupants are plunged against a tree. Edmund is seriously injured. Winnie staggers to her feet and returns to Graham's house. There she finds her foster father. She tells him of the accident. Edmund is brought home. The night wears on; the chances for Edmund's recovery grow slim, Graham, who has rushed off to get a doctor, is caught in one of his own bear traps. There he remains through the night. When they find him in the morning his ears are deaf to the news of his own son's death. Both father and son have met punishment in death.

As an epilogue we see Winnie's father taking the girl and Dick to a mound in the hills. There he tells them his own story. The girl is repentant and in the end we see the young pair happily married.

UNIVERSAL BOY IN "THE GATES OF LIBERTY" (Oct. 22).—Word is received by certain New York agents of a foreign government that one Borris Burdett, a political refugee, who has knowledge of important war secrets, is about to arrive in New York with his wife as a steerage passenger. The agents conspire to have Burdett deported as an undesirable citizen so that he might fall again into the hands of their government.

The Universal Boy happens to be visiting Ellis Island when Burdett makes his appearance. Burdett is being examined. Our hero notes the vindictive manner in which the foreign conspirators are laying their chances against him. From the unfortunate man's wife the boy learns the trouble; he learns that if the pair are deported it will mean death for them when they reach the other side, so he plans to help them escape.

Matty leaves the Island and calls up his friend, Judge Leon Sanders; he explains the situation and invokes his aid. The judge accompanies the boy to the Island. They arrive in time to hear the decision by the board that Burdett and his wife should be deported. The judge interferes; he talks with the young foreigner and is much impressed with his apparent education. By showing that there is no documentary evidence against Burdett, and that he would make a desirable citizen, the judge finally has the decision changed.

THE TURN OF THE TIDE (Two Parts—Nov. 2).—Tom Walters pays court to Nell, the old fisherman's daughter. Though Tom is honest and of their own people, Nell's father objects to him as a son-in-law. He has hopes of cancelling a note to his old friend, Clem Masters, by marrying his daughter off to him. However, he keeps the fact of his debt to Masters a secret. One day Tom learns of the financial embarrassment of his sweetheart's father. He offers the old man his own savings, but is refused and ordered away. Tom places the matter before the girl. She finally consents to allow him to take the note from its hiding place, under the seat of an old chair and pay it off. By this unselfish act on Tom's part, she hopes to gain her father's consent.

After paying the note Tom returns to find no one home; he places the note, receipted, back in its place, planning to tell her about it later. As he leaves the house, however, the father observes him. Questions are asked. Tom refuses to explain his presence there. In a rage the old man draws a gun on the boy and fires. Tom is wounded in the head; it results in the loss of his memory. He cannot even remember the hiding place of the note.

About this time a man and his daughter arrive from the city. The girl takes a fancy to the boy and plays with his affections. Tom, having forgotten his first sweetheart, believes the butterfly loves him. She encourages this belief, and when she leaves Tom follows her to the city.

Once in the city Tom learns the truth, that it was only a pass time for the girl, that he was only her plaything. All this time the little fishermaid remains true to his memory. Tom turns to business. He works with a might and becomes successful. Then comes the desire to return, to see again the old place by the sea.

On the day of his return there is a terrific storm at sea. The "girl" is out in it; her boat is overturned. The town people look on, afraid to venture out to the rescue. Tom comes on the scene just in the nick of time. He effects a rescue and carries the "girl" in his arms to her father's house. He places her in the old arm chair. The bottom drops out, disclosing the hiding place of the forgotten note, receipted. The discovery causes a return of memory. Tom recognizes the "girl." The old home is saved and the father, realizing what he has done, forgives

THE UNIVERSAL BOY IN "THE MYSTERY OF THE NEW YORK DOCKS" (Nov. 5).—Matty goes to the docks to view the ships tied up as a result of the war. Being just a boy, he gets into mischief and is roughly handled by the brutal mate of a foreign steamer. Matty vows to be revenged; picking up a ripe tomato he steals toward the mate, who is now talking to the captain of another ship, an over-dressed swell and a mysterious Hindu. Matty becomes interested in the whispered conversation and forgets to throw the tomato. He hears them make plants to meet at the same place that night at twelve.

Matty is on hand when the meeting takes place. He observes the Hindu leave the steamer with a long bundle. He follows him to a deserted house, climbs the fire-escape and descends the chimney. Matty finds himself in a darkened room; he feels around and touches a bundle on the floor. This bundle turns out to be a beautiful girl. Matty is frightened—escapes from the place to seek aid.

Meantime, the Hindu returns to the room with his companions. He sees the tracks left by the boy and the black finger prints; he starts in terror at the thought that someone has followed him to the place. Accusing his companions of betraying him, he takes the girl and leaves. Matty sees him leave the house. He hurries to the navy yard and secures the aid of an officer and two sailors. They pursue the Hindu, who has taken to a boat. In the chase, the Hindu's boat is upset. The girl, now recovered from her hypnotic trance, screams. The officer dives after her. There is a fight in the water between the officer and the Hindu. In the end the gang is rounded up and the girl rescued.

OLAF ERICKSON, BOSS (Two Parts—Oct. 22).—A stranger and his daughter arrive in the mountain lumber camp, the destiny of which is in the hands of the boss and bully, Olaf Erickson. Erickson casts covetous eyes upon the fresh young beauty of the stranger's daughter. He is overcome with anger when he finds she is accepting the attention of Al, one of the lumbermen in his employ. He interferes and receives a smart slap in the face. This seems to bring him to see himself and things in a different light. He determines to seek out the girl and offer an apology for his action. He falls in with Al and the girl, who are on their way to the lake for a canoe ride. His apology is accepted, and he is invited to accompany the two. Upon arriving at the lake, however, a man from the camp catches up with them and informs Erickson that there is a man in the camp who wishes to see him. Erickson turns back and finds the newcomer to be a secret service agent seeking a criminal and his daughter, who are believed to be in hiding in the mountains thereabouts.

Erickson recognizes the description as that of the stranger and his daughter. After a struggle with himself he tells the officer he knows of no such persons. Overcome with emotion, he returns to the vicinity of the lake. The secret service man remains in camp chumming with the men. Al and the girl embark in the canoe. In the course of the former's advances, which become repulsive to the girl, the canoe is upset. Instead of remaining and looking after the safety of the girl, Al shows himself the coward he is. Leaving her to her fate, he seeks safety for himself. The girl is saved by the prompt action of Erickson. The secret service agent has, meanwhile, caught sight of the stranger, the criminal in question, and keeps close track of him. The next morning he discovers his quarry attempting to escape from the camp, the latter having become aware of the officer's presence.

Erickson sees the officer sneaking after the stranger and decides to see what is up. He is witness to a gun duel in the woods, in which both men are killed. He carries the body of the stranger, whose daughter he has learned to love, back to camp. The secret service man, now out of the way, Erickson shows the girl the documents concerning herself and her father, left in his hands by the secret service man. This causes her to tell him their story. She also confesses her love for Erickson and the story ends happily.

THE DECISION (Oct. 25).—The man is engaged to Big Sister who really doesn't love him as a properly engaged girl should. To Little Sister, however, he is the ideal lover. Little Sister imagines if she were grown up, he might love her. She goes to town and buys a whole wardrobe of grown-up clothes. The man fails in business and Big Sister casts him aside. He goes away for a long time, but comes back when good fortune has again smiled on him. Big Sister and her father and mother receive him with open arms. Little Sister puts on her grown-up clothes and waits for him in the garden. When he does not come as soon as she hoped for, she breaks her parasol and throws aside her hat. Then he comes and realizes that it is Little Sister whom he really loves. Thus the story ends.

LET US HAVE PEACE (Two Parts—Nov. 5).—The painful situation which develops in this play threatens to disrupt the happiness of two young people, a boy and a girl. It is the old fathers. One is a Frenchman, the other a German. For years they have been friends. Their children love. Then comes the war and the breaking off of old ties.

Alphonse Marteau is the old Frenchman's name. He lives with his daughter, Jeannette, on a ranch. His neighbor, Franz Schmitt, and his son live on an adjoining farm. Both Marteau and Schmitt are veterans of the Franco-German war of 1870. They are friends, and before the opening of the war both favor the match between their children. But with the news of the present European hostilities comes memories of the fighting 40 years before. Marteau cannot resist the temptation to garb himself in his old regimental suit. Schmitt finds him thus. An argument is the result.

Schmitt returns home and orders his son, Max, to put up the German flag on its staff. Schmitt then adorns himself in the German military costume with his iron cross decoration on his breast. Max rebels and rebukes his father for making such a fuss. Time goes on and the breach between the old veterans widens. One day Schmitt is out fishing in the woods; he comes upon his friend Marteau lying in the road injured by a fall from his horse. For the moment Schmitt's feeling is one of compassion. He remembers Marteau only as his old friend. Tieing a scarf, given him by Jeannette, around the wound, Schmitt carries Marteau to his home.

When Marteau recovers consciousness he recognizes the scarf and experiences a feeling of remorse. He sends for Schmitt and his son. A reconciliation follows. Consent is again given for the two young people to renew their courtship. As the picture fades out we see the characters standing before General Grant's tomb in New York, looking at the inscription, a famous expression made by the now dead President, "Let Us Have Peace."

THE LINK THAT BINDS (Two Parts—Nov. 8).—In the prologue of this picture, Fergus McClain is left a widower with a young son. His sorrow is bitter, but he directs all his love and attentions to the little boy.

Follow a lapse of twenty years. The boy Donald has grown to manhood; he is the apple of his father's eye. Returning from college, Donald is taken into his father's office. Here he meets Jessie, his father's stenographer and the daughter of an artisan. The boy is attracted to her and in time Jessie loves the handsome collegian "not wisely but too well."

As time goes on the boy wearies of his conquest; he returns from the girl to bury himself in club amusements. The girl is in a delicate condition; she confides in her father, who appeals to the boy's father to have justice done his daughter. McClain, the elder, agrees with the girl's father that the couple shall marry. Donald, returning from the club, is confronted with his guilt and appealed to. He refuses. His father is puzzled to know what to do. Then it is that the girl's father decides to take the law into his own hands. He waits for the boy as he comes from the house; he shoves a gun against the boy's side and commands him to go along.

Once in the house, with the girl, in her suffering, before him, Donald's feelings undergo a transformation. His fury is changed to sympathy, akin to love, and a desire for forgiveness. He gladly consents to the marriage and the girl's father goes for the minister. In the meantime, the elder McClain has decided to attempt an atonement of his boy's sin by marrying the girl himself. He comes to the house with this purpose in mind. He is surprised and glad to find his boy there, crushed and repentant. The wedding ceremony is performed with the boy folding the girl in his arms, his love revived. A lapse shows the happy family gathered on the lawn at the McClain's home. The nurse advances and places the new arrival in the arms of the father. The baby is the "link that binds."

Then they enjoyed driving down to the new Manhattan Bridge, back over the famous Brooklyn Bridge, and thence home to luncheon. Margaret had promised to join Ralph Hamilton and his sister that afternoon at the Wykagyl Country Club. There she met the idol of thousands of golfers all over the world, the illustrious, witty Alec Smith, who, when he found that Our Mutual Girl never in her life had held a golf club, gallantly offered his services. His Scottish burr, she decided, was adorable, so she gaily accepted. In the course of the afternoon, Margaret really did learn something about golf, but when Ralph Hamilton invited her to play her way back to the club house with him, she mischievously refused. She was in no humor, as yet, to acquiesce readily to that young man's suggestions, and as they sat on the turf, Margaret munching a juicy apple, which he had given her, she offered him never a bite, but compelled Young Hamilton to chew the bitter cud of reflection. On the way back over the links, they came upon a pompous man threatening his caddy with his stick. He explained irefully that the young scoundrel had stolen his watch. "I'll give you just ninety seconds to produce it," he was saying to the boy. But just then up came Betty Hamilton, watch in hand. She had picked it up on the knoll where the pompous person had dropped it from his pocket. Then the millionaire (a millionaire he was) showed his real caliber. Handing his card to the caddy, he apologized and said, "My boy, when you want something, come to my office."

Our Mutual Girl went home that night well satisfied with the day's adventures.

On Saturday Rock is followed on the street by a couple of crooks. He goes into a telephone booth to phone his daughter Max and her fiance a young physician that they can start South with the younger sister at once. Taking the money out of the bank satchel, he stuffs it in his inside vest pocket and leaves with the empty bag in his hand. He goes down an alley way to get rid of the satchel, but is assaulted by the gunmen and the bag taken from him. A salesman from Rock's firm sees the attack. He takes the half unconscious cashier back to the office. When the money is found upon his person, the company believes that Rock, knowing that he was shadowed, put it there for safety. A patient with heart failure is received, and Nurse Norris reports to Dr. Hunter that he needs a stimulating prescription. The doctor, in a great hurry unconsciously writes in an overdose of strychnine. Miss Norris corrects the dose, and administers the right amount. The patient's heart fails to respond, however, and he goes into a coma and dies. Dr. Hunter returns on the discovery of his mistake to find the man dead. Nurse Norris is out of the room. Believing himself responsible, he hurriedly gathers together his belongings and quits the hospital, leaving a self-condemnatory note. The nurse reports the death and is cross-questioned by the authorities. She shows her chart and the doctors are convinced that she has corrected the prescription. An autopsy further vindicates her claims.

On leaving the hospital Hunter is mentally wrecked by the thought of his apparently fatal carelessness, and seeks surcease in morphine. One day at a beach resort where he is staying, he rescues a child from drowning. The incident brings him and Nurse Norris together again. She explains the natural cause of the patient's death, and later succeeds in leading the young doctor out of the grip of the drug habit into a new life.

THE RUIN OF MANLEY (Two Parts—Nov. 2).—Both mother and father of Mary, whom Manley loves, agree that Manley is worthless, and Manley himself is aware of this. Manley's sister believes it is because he can take no interest in the type of work which opportunity has given him and regrets that there is no money to be made in pigeons, the one hobby of Manley. When Manley runs away in a desperate effort to make good, he meets Jared Smith, a keen old farmer, who learns of his hobby for pigeons, and is the means of his starting a pigeon farm. His success is immediate. Later, when he looks for a site for a larger farm, he is sold a piece of ground by a rival for the hand of Mary, all unconscious of the fact that the land is threatened whenever the spring floods reach the record breaking point. The pigeon farm grows tremendously and his marriage to Mary is finally approved and planned for. Then the week before the wedding a misunderstanding results in a quarrel and Mary and Hanley break. Shortly following come the tremendous floods, resulting in the complete sweeping away of the farm into the torrent and before the very eye of Manley. Crushed, he is about to give up when he strengthens his upper lip—he made good once and can do so again. And then Mary, having learned of the trick in the sale of the land, hurries to Manley to tell him that she has come, as he now needs her more than ever.

WHEN THE ROAD PARTS (Nov. 4).—Laura, a girl of the tenements, has alowed herself to be dominated by a crook. This man, Joe, comes upon an automobile accident one day in which a young man is injured. The injured man and his girl companion are taken away in the ambulance and after it has gone, Joe finds a letter that has dropped from the young man's pocket. It is addressed to Frank Bell in a nearby country town. Joe opens the letter and reads it. It says: "This will introduce Henry Brice and his sister, Miss Mary Brice. I know that their services will be absolutely satisfactory to you, as both of them are competent and trustworthy." Joe decides that he and Laura can impersonate Henry Brice and his sister and perhaps make something out of the scheme.

Laura and Joe are received by Frank Bell and, upon arriving at his home, are introduced to his father; Joe, as the father's new nurse, and Laura as Frank's secretary. They enter into their new work and manage to please Frank and his father. Joe is constantly on the lookout for the combination of the safe in the library, planning to make a big haul. Frank, as the days go by, becomes interested in Laura and finally asks her to marry him, but Laura, now really in love with him, cannot consent. Joe, aware of Frank's attention to Laura, tries to get her to "string him along." This she refuses to do, but is finally forced by Joe to consent to help, which conversation is overheard by Frank.

That night Joe and Laura are about to rob the safe when Frank comes from behind the curtains and turning up the lights points his gun at Joe and orders the two to leave the house. They go to the gate, where Laura stops and says: "Here is where our roads part," and starts up the road. Joe orders her to come with him. Laura shakes her head and starts off in the other direction. Joe watches after her a while, then shrugs his shoulders and goes on. Frank, on the veranda, has been a witness to this scene and when he sees Laura take the opposite way alone, he realizes that her redemption has been complete. He follows her and brings her home. The next morning Frank brings Laura to his father, seated in his wheelchair on the veranda, and says: "Your nurse was called away last night, father, and after to-day my secretary will be my wife."

A RUDE AWAKENING (Oct. 27).—Albert Bolton, who loves his cards and club rooms, leaves his wife with the excuse that he has to work and promises to be home by 10 P. M. Bob Horton, Grant Harley and Harry Maloy impatiently await his arrival, and when he does arrive at the club explains his difficulty in getting away. They start in playing. Ten o'clock arrives and they still play. Time is forgotten. Mary, his wife, has spent the evening reading, and when the hour of ten arrives calls up his office, having suspicions regarding Al. At one o'clock Al glances at the clock. He is slightly ruffled, but the boys tell him he is late anyway and might as well make the best of a night out. Drinks are passed and game continues. Mary, who has determined to await Al's coming, goes to sleep in the chair. At 3 A. M. Al looks at the clock and starts. He insists on going home. They leave unsteadily from many drinks. Mary still sleeps. Al arrives at home to find he had no door key. He sits on the steps and falls asleep and dreams.

Al is ordered around by Mary, who finally hands him a book to read to her. He refuses and takes out a cigar, to her amazement and against her orders starts to smoke. Bob, Grant and Harry enter. Mary leaves the room. They suggest a night out to Al. He calls Mary and tells her he is going. She says to wait as she is going along. Mary exits and a little later, transformed from the prim, severe Mary to a coquettish girl, attired in the latest fashions. She takes the arms of two of the boys and Al follows them, angrily protesting against her going. They go to a cafe, where Mary is the center of attraction. Mary joins in the dancing and Al sits gloomily and looks on. A tango dance results in all claiming Mary. One man claims her and puts his arm around her. This is too much for Al, who rushes up and wants to fight. The three boys take him out and Mary follows waving farewell to the gay crowd. Bob then leads the way to a gambling den and they enter, followed by Al, grumbling. A plain clothes man watches them. In the gambling room Mary plays to Al's disgust and against his wishes, and wins with veteran-like playing. The police raid and they exit through a panel in the wall out a rear door. A policeman sees them and they run. He gives chase. They jump into a standing auto and drive off. When policeman and owner arrive the quintet have disappeared and they sit down to rest. They arrive in front of Bolton's home. Bob, Grant and Harry say good night. As they depart Mary blows them a kiss, which is too much for Al.

Mary awakens from her sleep and looks at the clock. She goes to the door and stumbles over Al. She drags him into the house and shoves him in a chair. She starts to lecture. To Mary's surprise he walks to her in the midst of her lecture and pats her on the shoulder, telling her he is glad she is the prim kind.

MAJESTIC.

PAID WITH INTEREST (Two Parts—Nov. 1).—Mame is a waitress in a cheap eating place. Tom is an electrician's helper. Calling to fix wires, he meets Mame and falls in love with her. She later returns his affection and they plan to marry when he has obtained a raise and becomes a regular electrician himself. A rift comes in their lute, however, by the advent of George, a wealthy broker, whose car breaks down near the restaurant and who comes in to get a cup of coffee. Mame serves him and he becomes enamored of her and she is flattered by his attentions. Gradually her love for Tom wanes and a real affection dawns for the broker.

Tom does not believe his attentions are honorable and believes that only his money has attracted Mame and he plans to ruin the broker. Called to the office building of the broker's office to repair wires, while working on the roof he overhears a conversation from the broker's office to his agents and gets wise to the fact that the broker is to give a message to sell at a certain time; if the agent doesn't get a call at that time he is to buy. At the time appointed, the broker phones to sell, and it is apparent that to buy will ruin him, but Tom, getting wise by his wire on the roof, cuts it, so that the broker's agent cannot get the message, and the broker is wiped out. Tom is delighted, thinking that now Mame and the broker cannot marry, but is astounded to discover that it has made no difference with Mame. Tom then realizes that his jealousy has made it hard for the girl and the man, who is an honorable suitor, and resolves to make it up to them somehow.

The broker starts life over again, marries Mame and they are happy. Tom remains the true pal of both, and though unhappy and in love with George's wife, protects George in every way from himself. George, to gamble, steals his wife's jewels and loses the money for which he pawned them, but Tom reclaims them and returns them, and George promises not to gamble again, but does. The wife says it is all right so long as he loves her and is true to her. One day George is seriously injured and dies. Tom is forced to break the news to George's wife. He finds a watch on George, and plans to take this little memento to the wife and thus soften the blow. When he opens the watch he finds there the photo of another woman and realizes that George is unworthy of his wife and her love for him. To save her illusion, he takes a watch from his own person, removes the photo of George's wife from it, puts it in George's watch and carries it to Mame, who thereafter always believes that George loved her.

FALSE PRIDE (Nov. 3).—Hiram Judson, a proud old man, is living with his grown daughter, Nora, and his twelve-year-old daughter, Ellen. He is possessed of an income from a mine out west, and refuses to allow Nora to work, although the small income barely suffices to pay for their rooms and board in the boarding house kept by Mrs. Casey. Nora wants to work so she can have pretty clothes. Her father proudly tells her he is the support of the family and they must content themselves with what he provides. Nora has a beau, Frank Colton, whom her father doesn't look upon with favor.

Judson receives word that his small income has been swept away. Still proud, he bravely determines he will earn sufficient to take care of his family and starts forth to find work, forbidding Nora to take any work or to help in any way except about the house.

He finds it impossible to raise much money on account of his age. Finally in desperation, at the imminent loss of a roof over their heads, he accepts a job as a porter in an office building. It doesn't pay enough. When her father goes to work, Nora slips out, answers an ad. and gets a job with the firm of lawyers whose letter had announced the cessation of her father's income. This office is in the same building that Judson is now a porter.

To save her father's pride and to keep him from the knowledge of her working, she mails her salary to him, writing on a letter head of the firm, saying a small amount of the income was recoverable, etc. The old man is very proud and happy over it. He is glad that with his little income and his job he will be enabled to support them nicely.

The knowledge that he is able to take care of them without assistance makes him feel better over the bum job he has. Things go along all right until Frank sees the old man one day and tries to prevent his working, telling him he will marry Nora and he can live with them. Judson refuses and forbids him to see Nora any more. He reprimands Nora when she protests, repeating his assertion that he is the provider of the family and she must do as he says. Frank wants to tell the old man it is Nora's wages that support him more than his own, but Nora forbids him.

One day Judson finds an error in a letter from the firm in reference to his remittance and calls to see them about it and finds out the truth. His pride wounded, he is angry at first, but finally realizes his daughter's love and care for him, and consents to her marriage, and reconciles himself to letting someone else care for him and his family henceforth.

THE WEIGHT OF A CROWN (Three Parts—Lubin).—Prince Rupert, the ruler of the kingdom of Darinia, is young and easily influenced by his ministers. One night at the Imperial Opera House he meets Olga, the dancer, and has her brought into his box that he may compliment her. A mutual attraction springs up between them.

Olga's father is the leader of a noted band of revolutionists and makes his daughter take the vow that at any time she may be called upon she will do its bidding. Furious over a new tax imposed in the Prince's name, they plan to do away with him. Each member of the band takes his or her chance and to Olga falls the red dice of death. She promises to be faithful, but her heart is nearly broken at the thought of harm coming to Rupert. Carl, one of the band and Olga's devoted admirer, thinking that she is weak, snatches the dice from her and says that he will kill the Prince in her place. She refuses to permit this. That night she dines with Rupert at his request. He tells her he loves her and she permits him to draw her into his arms. This is her chance. She raises the dagger behind his back and makes ready to plunge it into his throat, but her hand is powerless to strike the blow, and her grip releases on the knife and her hand falls gently upon his shoulder. She confesses the plot and he laughingly breaks the knife in half. She returns to the band and lies, telling them she had no opportunity to reach the Prince.

In the morning she runs away to join Rupert. His ministers horrified at his suggestion that he marry Olga, the dancer, try to dissuade him. He is firm, however, and they are finally forced to permit her becoming his morganatic wife. They go away together and are ideally happy for a time in the country. Then, when war threatens, it becomes necessary for Darinia to form an alliance with the neighboring Kingdom of Marne, through the Prince, and he is recalled to the Palace. He learns that he is expected to marry the Princess of Marne. He protests, but when told emphatically that it is for his country's sake, for his people's welfare, he gives in. He meets Princess Marie and finds her a sweet, charming girl. But his heart is with Olga, and his proposal is a very formal one. He visits Olga to say good-bye. Olga is given a decree of divorce and is promised an income from the state, which she flings back at them.

On the day of Rupert's wedding, Olga's child is born. She returns to her own people and her miserable aspect breaks her father's heart and he dies of grief. Years pass, Olga's son, reared in poverty and among the revolutionists, is a fine boy of five. Rupert's heir is four. Revolution breeds in Darinia and its murmurings reach the palace. Rupert laughs at the idea of being afraid of his own people, and going out upon the balcony he presents his son to the mob. Threats change to cries of "Long Live the Prince."

Olga. A the mob, sees the child and the sight of it fans the flame of hatred into new life. A plot is on foot to do away with both the Prince and his son the next day when they appear in public. A spy carries this information back to the palace. Carl and his two comrades bid Olga good-bye and start off. Each is ready if any of the others fail.

The spy and the soldiers enter the house after the men have left and, finding their prey gone, take Olga and her child into custody. A soldier is dressed in the Prince's uniform to attract the fire of the revolutionists whom all know lie in wait. Olga is taken to the palace and brought to a room outside of which is the large balcony. She is told to point out her comrades in the crowd. She laughs and refuses. Her child then is garbed as the little Prince and she is told he must take the consequences. She tries to save him, but it is no use. He is sent on the balcony. She pleads for the Prince and he comes to her. Carl, recognizing Olga's child on the balcony, does not shoot, but the other two men do. The boy is killed and the soldier in the Prince's uniform wounded.

Rupert realizes it is Olga before him and is horror stricken. The dead boy is carried in. Olga, frantic with grief, takes him into her arms. Rupert draws closer to her, trying to offer her some consolation. "Look upon your first born son," she says, and staring at the boy in her arms he knows the truth. Carl swings upon the balcony and makes an attempt upon the Prince's life, but kills Olga instead. She dies in Rupert's arms, and he places his robe about her.

THE WOLF (Six Parts—Lubin).—When Jules Beaubien's father died, the young man found himself heir to the stout old mansion at Montreal and a big fortune which the family had made in the lumber of the great Canadian forests. But on his death bed his father made a confession that twenty years ago he met a squaw of the Ojibway tribe and that a girl child was born. She was now up in the Nipissing country with a French Canadian family that adopted her. Old Beaubien's last words to his son exacted a promise that the boy would find his half sister, educate and care for her and give her a liberal share of the estate. Arriving in the Nipissing country Jules found that the family has moved from the valley, but he was informed that a woodsman, Baptiste Le Grande, could tell him all about the girl, as he was her sweetheart. He loved the girl with all the strength of his rough manhood, but a city man came along and betrayed her. Baptiste tried to tell the story, but his rage would not permit him to be coherent and Father Paul continued. He told Jules that the seducer abandoned the girl and went back to America. Annette, knowing she was disgraced, ran away from her foster parents and wandered to the camps, where the women of the trappers tried to care for her; she became delirious but she never mentioned the man's name. When her child was born she wandered out into a storm and with her babe in her arms laid down in the snow and died and the wolves ate her and the child. Jules and Baptiste joined hands and swore to find this man and kill him. It the Indian summer Jules and Baptiste put up at MacTavish's house. Two other men arrived, Mr. McDonald, a civil engineer, and his assistant, Mr. Huntley, who were surveying for a Canadian railroad. McDonald was a splendid specimen of physical manhood about forty years of age and very entertaining. His ability at his profession has made him rich and with all he was a man of courage and likeable.

MacTavish's daughter, Hilda, did the cooking and housekeeping and it was not surprising that McDonald and Jules soon noticed that each was contesting for the smile of the Scotchman's daughter, and Hilda was not averse to the pleasantries of the good-looking boarders, for her life was far from being a happy one, her mother not being able to stand the irascible MacTavish had run away when Hilda was a child and the father vented his revenge and hatred upon the daughter. Jules loved Hilda while the other man was simply playing for a dishonorable advantage. One day the men admitted their rivalry face to face. Jules was willing to play the game fair, but demanded of McDonald if his intentions were honest. The roue laughed in the other man's face, admitted that he had a wife in America, but boasted of his power over women. In his bravado he told of an affair some years ago with a little half breed girl up in the Nipissing country. It was the story of Annetta, Jules should have killed him on the spot, but one impulse prevented, he was a man of honor, he could not assassinate, he must fight this fiend man to man, and it would be before the day had spent. Then he must also tell Baptiste, who would also want to kill him, which he would if Jules fell in the fight. McDonald, feeling that he was losing ground with Hilda, planned to work her ruin through her father. He told MacTavish that he had a good mother in America that would care for and educate Hilda, and that then he would marry her. The old Scotchman was only too willing to get rid of the girl and demanded of her that she would go with McDonald. Jules had told Hilda of the good love and the bad love. When MacTavish ordered her to go with McDonald she resisted; the old man in his rage would have seized her by the throat and strangled her, but Jules bore him to the floor of the cabin, while Baptiste from outside the window covered McDonald with his Winchester. The fight was desperate and long, but Jules seized Hilda, and with Baptiste and Huntley, who had discovered his master's villainy, the four hastened to the creek and in a canoe which had been furnished with supplies for the trip, made towards the Canadian railway for Montreal. McDonald followed and Jules left the party at a landing to meet him. A desperate duel was fought, in which McDonald was killed and Jules and his party, after burying the body, hastened to his home and happiness.

THE NAKED TRUTH (Five Parts).—In the Latin Quarter of Paris lives Lolette, who is known throughout the artists' colony as the handsomest girl in Paris. In spite of the fact that her services as a model are sought after by the leading painters and sculptors of the city, she poses only for Armand Bouchard, a mediocre painter who befriended her when she was left a penniless orphan several years before. Under Bouchard's humble roof she lives the life of the Parisian studio dweller, happy and contented, the idol of her benefactor.

Pierre Bernier, a close friend of Bouchard's and an artist of unusual promise, has seen a number of his best ideas fail in practice because of his lack of a model in whose make-up both beauty and intelligence were combined in goodly measure, and finally he succeeds in persuading Bouchard to consent to his employing Lolette. During the days when his masterpiece is in the making, a passionate love affair springs up between him and his pretty model. Then marriage quickly follows. When his picture wins the grand prize at the Salon and is sold to a connoisseur for a fancy price, the two establish themselves in a fine house in a fashionable part of the city. Poor Bouchard is soon forgotten.

As his prosperity increases, Pierre becomes more and more ashamed of his wife's humble origin and less and less enthralled by her charms. Later he becomes entangled in a love affair with the Princess Dupont, a dilettante in the realm of art and a woman of great wealth and established social position. Lolette suspects, and when finally she surprises the pair alone during the progress of a ball which the artist is giving in honor of a notable success he has recently achieved, she is certain that she has lost her husband's love.

In desperation she goes to the aged prince, her rival's husband, and begs him to interfere. He refuses, telling the girl that arrangements for a separation between him and his wife are already under way and that he has no further interest in what she does. She then decides to appeal directly to the woman herself. For a moment the Princess' worldly heart is touched and she promises to break with Pierre. Her good resolution, however, is short-lived, and it is not long before Lolette's husband is again enmeshed in the tangled skeins of infatuation and intrigue. Lolette again appeals to the better nature of her rival, this time without the slightest success. Announcing her intention of securing a divorce, she hurries home, and that evening Pierre finds her lying half-dead on the floor, the butt of a revolver claspeu tightly in her hand.

Brought to their senses by Lolette's attempt upon her own life, both Pierre and the princess resolve to end their intimacy, and at the bedside of the wounded woman, both promise her to make amends. The woman keeps her word, but the husband, although making an effort to appear once more devoted to his wife, soon betrays his innate unworthiness. Heartbroken, Lolette sends him away, and when she has sufficiently recovered from her wound to leave her bed, we find her slowly making her way back to the old studio in the Latin Quarter, tenderly led by the faithful Bouchard.

HEARTS AND MASKS (Special—Three Parts).—Galloping Dick, a clever thief, occupies fashionable bachelor apartments. He is invariably accompanied by William, who acts the part of valet and body-servant while in the apartments, and as an expert, faithful and clever accomplice in the robberies committed by Galloping Dick. One evening William sits in the apartment impatiently waiting for the return of Dick, who arrives finally after a successful robbery and turns over to William some rich jewels, which the latter places in a concealed safe built in the wall.

In the meantime, the robbery is discovered and there is a great agitation in the mansion where Mrs. Richwell has learned of her loss. Detective Haggerty is notified of the robbery and arrives on the scene. Mrs. Hyphen-Bonds, one of the wealthy patrons of art has finished a last sitting for Mrs. Hawthorne, the clever and fascinating young miniature painter. She states that she is going to Europe, and therefore will pay for the completed miniature. While so doing, she accidentally drops from her purse an invitation to a masque ball at the Hunt Club. The invitation contains a playing card, the ten of hearts.

Dick Comstock, a young automobile salesman, decides at five o'clock that it is time to leave his place of business. At the Hunt Club all arrangements are being made for the ball. It is to be a pretentious affair and the club rooms are being lavishly decorated.

Detective Haggerty, believing that he is at last upon the trail of Galloping Dick, calls at the apartments which his deductions have designated as a lair of his prey, and obtaining entrance, awaits the return of the thief.

Miss Hawthorne and her uncle go to dinner at the Moquin Cafe, and it so happens that Dick Comstock is shown to a seat at the same table. The waiter brings him a newspaper, and he sees the announcement of the masque ball at the Hunt Club. He decides upon a lark, sends the waiter for a pack of cards and after shuffling and cutting draws the ten of hearts. The three enter into conversation and Miss Hawthorne, after startling her uncle by explaining that she will attend the ball surreptitiously as Mrs. Hyphen-Bonds, goes to a costumer to select something to wear. Within the next half hour, Comstock goes to the same costumer and selects a suitable disguise to wear at the ball.

Galloping Dick enters his apartment and the waiting detective covers the thief and William with his revolver and demands their surrender. They trick him into close quarters, seize and bind him and toss him into the closet. On his person is an invitation to attend the masque ball at the Hunt Club in order to guard the jewels, and enclosed with the letter of explanation and invitation, is a playing card, the ten of hearts. Galloping Dick abstracts this, and decides to seek a new hunting ground at the masque ball that night. William is to accompany him. Galloping Dick goes to the costumer and there meets Dick Comstock. The costumer makes a mistake and places the card properly belonging to the costume of Miss Hawthorne in the package sent to the apartment of Dick Comstock. At the ball that evening he recognizes the blue domino.

All goes merrily at the ball. Galloping Dick succeeds in cleverly stealing a gorgeous diamond tiara and a rope of exquisite pearls, which he passes to William through the door leading to the cellar. In a few moments there is wild consternation. The women proceed to announce their loss to Teddy Hamilton, the club manager, and he declares to the assembly that there is a thief among them. Bold Galloping Dick, who has pinned the detective badge of Haggerty to his waistcoat, ascends the platform, throws off his disguise, announces that he is Detective Haggerty and ends by saying that every one present shall remain until they shall have been identified. Dick Comstock realizes that there will be an extra ten of hearts to be shown and does not desire to be caught. He confesses to the fascinating Miss Hawthorne that he is an imposter, whereupon she confesses that she also is an imposter. Hand in hand they run from room to room in an endeavor to escape from the house.

Comstock finds the way to the cellar and they hasten into the subterranean darkness, hoping to find an exit leading outside. In the cellar they accidentally encounter William, who draws his revolver and "sticks them up." William compels Comstock to take a pair of wire cutters and remove a wire screen from the window and then makes his escape with the stolen jewels in his possession. The young couple stumble back up the stairs and flounder into the drawing room, where they are immediately pounced upon by the local constabulary, the members of which have been summoned by Hamilton.

Detective Haggerty has at last escaped from the closet and makes all speed to the Hunt Club. Galloping Dick is located in the village inn by Haggerty, who has mobilized the village constabulary, and who enter upon the scene just as Galloping Dick is robbing young Comstock and Miss Hamilton, who have been released upon the recognition of Teddy Hamilton, an old friend. Haggerty arrests Galloping Dick and William, after a sharp encounter with revolvers. Galloping Dick, the gay society buccaneer, is marched away with a broken wrist, while Dick Comstock and Miss Hawthorne rapidly cement their friendship, which immediately assumes the proportion of a love affair.

JUDGE NOT (Four Parts).—Judge Edward Martin, a criminal court magistrate, is found dead on a street corner early one morning, and the investigations of a coroner's jury definitely establish the fact that he was murdered. There is no clue, however, to the identity of the murderer, and the police are unable to discover any. Even the shrewd special detectives assigned to the case are baffled by the mystery. Henry Duval, prosecuting attorney and close friend of the murdered man, resolves to untangle the skein of conflicting evidence and locate the guilty man. In spite of the fact that he has of late suffered intensely from nervous trouble, which includes increasingly frequent periods of mental aberration, he foregoes his vacation and remains in the city to probe the mysterious killing of his friend. He is the more interested because he himself is the last person known to have seen the man alive, as he left the judge on his own doorstep late night of the murder

Duval soon learns that a sentimental friendship existed between the judge and Mrs. Lea Morrel, wife of a prosperous business man. When he learns, too, that Morrel was aware of this acquaintance and had forbidden his wife to meet the judge, he himself immediately suspects the husband's guilt. He places detectives on the watch and soon is in possession of a strong chain of circumstantial evidence which seems to establish beyond all shadow of doubt the fact that Morrel, impelled by jealousy of his wife, was guilty of the deed. An indictment is obtained and Morrel, unable to furnish any alibi, is held for trial without bail. Among Morrel's close personal friends is a physician who has made a special study of nervous diseases and who coincidentally was with the coroner when he examined the body of the murdered man the day following the commission of the crime. He becomes convinced that the killing was done by some one during a period of mental irresponsibility and that the murderer did not know what he was doing at the time. Learning of the prosecuting attorney's mental trouble, and considering the fact that the official was with the judge on the evening of the murder, he sets himself to investigate the case in good earnest. On the day before the trial of Morrel he calls upon Duval and asks permission to question him, a request which is readily granted.

Under the careful examination of the scientist, the truth is gradually brought home to Duval—that he himself is suspected of having dealt the blow that ended the life of his friend. The skilled questioning slowly causes him to remember a number of his own actions, things which he had done without even realizing at the time that he was doing them, until at last a vision suddenly flashes before his eyes; a vision of himself in the act of striking down his companion on that fatal night. The terrible knowledge that he is guilty of the very crime for which he is prosecuting Morrel strikes him like a thunderbolt the blow is too much for his weakened nervous system, and he falls dead at the feet of his inquisitor.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE (Fifteenth Episode—Two Parts).—Determined to possess the Marvin fortune, Owen realizes it will be necessary to remove Harry from his path. This will leave only Pauline to contend with. Owen and Balthazar hatch a new plot. Pauline has purchased a new racing car and entered it in a coming race. Harry is thunderstruck when she announces she intends driving it. Owen gives her every encouragement. Owen and Balthazar engage the services of Ferrari, a low character, to force Harry into a duel. The next day Ferrari encounters Pauline and Harry near the Marvin estate and insults Pauline. Harry knocks him down, which is really the result Ferrari looked for. He gives Harry his card, which is promptly torn in two.

Ferrari mocks him into accepting his challenge.

Receiving a note from Ferrari, Harry explains its import to Pauline, who is pleased at the prospect of witnessing a duel. Harry tells her he has no intention of really fighting, but Pauline points out to him that he should fight the bully. Harry agrees if Pauline will allow him to drive her car instead of doing so herself. Pauline consents, then accompanies Harry to where the duel is to be fought. They find Ferrari and his second, who approaches with the rapiers. Harry choses the sword that extends nearer to him. Ferrari seems pleased with the choice.

The duel begins and Harry takes the offensive, engaging his opponent fiercely, and maintains a furious attack. He disarms his adversary. Ferrari stoops to get his rapier; Harry picks it up, tossing his own sword at Ferrari's feet. Ferrari is stricken with fear for the sword he now holds was poisoned, in the hopes Harry would receive his death wound thereby. At a prearranged signal, Ferrari's henchmen rush in to seize Pauline and Harry. Pauline picks up the poisoned sword and goes to Harry's assistance. They battle against the odds, but finally manage to escape.
